discriminating against them. Heretofore they have based their oposcininating against them. Heretolore they have based their opposition to our hog-products on the false pretense that they are affected with trichinosis, although the scientists of those countries have by the most thorough and convincing tests demonstrated the absolute falsity of the charge. In February, 1883, the German parliamentary bodies finally adopted enactments prohibiting their importation into that empire. I immediately presented to this House a joint resolution and the product the product to adopt a retallictory measures the product. tion authorizing the President to adopt retaliatory measures against certain German imports; but this was done so near to the close of the then short session that it could not be reached for consideration. I presented a similar measure at the commencement of the next session applicable to other European governments which had pursued the same course, and it was referred to a committee, where it now lies, without final action. Three committees struggled for jurisdiction over that measure when it was presented; but it seems that their zeal over the question has ended.

When it is remembered that statistics show that we have in this country 47 per cent. of all the hogs in the world, I submit that our interest is large enough to deserve some protection against such unjust action.

France soon followed the course of Germany, but not content with assailing our meat product, she has restricted the importation of our breadstuff by burdensome taxation.

Emboldened by the supineness of the American Congress in the face of these outrages against our agricultural products, and the indifference manifested for the protection of these interests in the European markets, Austria is advancing to a position of open hostility to all American commerce in Europe.

EUROPEAN COALITION AGAINST AMERICAN FARM PRODUCTS,

She uses no mask of false pretenses that our merchandise is unwholesome, but openly advocates a continental coalition against the importation of any and all American farm products into Europe. To foster their agricultural interests and prevent competition from American farmers Austrian statesmen and press advocate the prohibition of our agricultural products as "the only salvation for the European peasant" for the future." The Vienna Tagblatt urges as a reason for prohibi-tion that the United States has vastly superior natural advantages in our immense area of fertile lands, capable of permanent and almost unlimited productiveness; that, having no standing army to maintain, the States do not take the working population away from the soil to make soldiers of them; our farmers are free from the immense burdens resting upon the agriculturists of Europe. "Therefore," says the Tagblatt, "American competition can only be overcome by shutting out the American from the European market." And it is asserted that the chief minister, Taaffe, is an advocate of the project.

Time will show whether the consumers in Europe will submit to a policy which will enormously enhance their cost of living, or whether discontent may not only grow into bread riots, but also to such formida-ble disturbances as will shatter the despotic governments guilty of mak-ing such oppressive laws. But there is enough in this movement to warn us that our domestic industries are seriously threatened. England is making considerable headway in finding new sources of supply of her breadstuffs in India, Australia, and other provinces of hers. If she should fall in with the Austrian movement, our agricultural interest will indeed reach a deplorable condition, unless we can find an outlet for our surplus in the southern and the Pacific Ocean countries. If we can control the southern markets through the agency of a zollverein, we may not only defy European combination, but we shall strike a blow against her manufacturing interest which will do her far more harm than any advantage she may gain by the prohibition of our agricultural

EFFECT OF THE ZOLLVEREIN IN GERMANY.

One of the most eminent living political economists has said that the German Zollverein was "the result of the highest sugacity, intelligence, and wisdom." Its wholesome and salutary action caused an immediate and marked improvement in the condition of the German states and the enlargement of their commerce. The progress of the Saxon cloth manufacturers in three years following their admission to the Union, from 1834 to 1837, is stated in an official report to have been greater than in the thirty years preceding.

PLAN OF THE GERMAN ZOLLVEREIN RECOMMENDED.

The proposition which I submit does not prescribe the terms upon which this union shall be formed. It merely authorizes the President to invite the co-operation of those governments in forming a union upon to invite the co-operation of those governments in forming a union upon such conditions as their representatives may after due deliberation determine. There is nothing in this proposition that binds them to any conditions, but they are left perfectly free to decide whether any alliance will be desirable, and, if so, what shall be its nature. I believe they will find the plan of the German Zollverein most desirable. No doubt some of its features will be found incompatible with the institutions of the continent. tutions and conditions on this continent. All such can be modified or wholly rejected, and others substituted which may be found more

Some European countries have declared war upon the introduction of our meats and breadstuffs into Europe and have adopted measures!

If the union is formed experience will in time, no doubt, show the need of change in the original terms of its organization, which can be made by the members of the union when their representatives assemble at such stated periods as will be designated; for there should be annual or other regular meetings of the representatives of the nations concerned to consider the general welfare, hear complaints, adjust difficulties, and make such new enactments as may be required.

HISTORY AND NATURE OF GERMAN ZOLLVEREIN.

The German Zollverein has been tested by the experience of over sixty Such defects as were discovered have been remedied. Its members have during that long period sought harmoniously the utmost de-gree of practicability. The right and interest of all have been scrupu-lously guarded and respected. Each and all have derived inestimable advantages from its formation. The smallest and weakest States as well as the largest and strongest have been benefited. So successful and beneficent has been its results, that the eminent political economist McCulloch, in his great work, has declared of Prussia, who was chiefly instrumental in forming the union, that-

Next to the efforts of the Prussian Government to diffuse the blessings of education their efforts to introduce a free commercial system into Germany constitutes their best claim to the gratitude and esteem of their own subjects and of

McCulloch defines the word zollverein (literally customs-union) as a compound word:

It means the association of a number of states for the establishment of a common customs law and customs line with regard to foreign countries, and the suppression of both for the intercourse of the states with each other within the border line. The compound word, however, has gained the meaning of a proper name for the German customs league.

The first treaties in furtherance of this object were negotiated by Prussia with the principalities of Schwarzburg-Sondershausen and Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, in 1818 and 1819, on the principle that there should be a perfect freedom of commerce between these countries and Prussia; that the duties on importation, exportation, and transit in Prussia and the principalities should be identical; that these should be charged along the frontier of the dominions of the contracting parties; and that each should participate in the produce of such duties in proportion to the population. All these treaties subsequently entered into have been founded on this fair and equitable principle; the only exceptions to the perfect freedom of trade in all the countries comprised within the league of tariff alliance being confined, first, to articles constituting state monopolics, as salt and cards in Prussia; second, to articles of mative produce burdened with a different rate of duty on consumption in one state from what they pay in another; and third, to articles produced under patents conferring on the patentes exceptions, which are not very important, the most perfect freedom of commerce exists among the allied states.

Since 1818, when the foundations of the alliance were laid, it has progressively extended, till it now comprises more than three-fourths of the Germanic states, exclusive of Ausfria. Ducal Hesse joined in the alliance in 1823, and Electoral Hesse in 1831; the Kingdoms of Bavaria, Saxony, and Wurtemberg joined it afterward, as have Baden, Nassau, and almost all the smaller states which have exception of Mecklenburg-Schwerin and Mecklenburg-Strelitz. * *

Throughout the whole extent of this immense country, from Aix-la-Chapelle, on the eastern confines of the Netherlands eastward to Tilsit, on the confines of Russia, and from Stettin and Dantzig southward to Switzerland and Bohemia, there is nothing to interrupt the freedom of commerce. A houses and thousands of custom onners to be employed in the different departments of industry.

The discrepancy in weights and measures used in different parts of Germany occasioned considerable inconvenience, and it is important that the equalization of weights and measures, and their reduction to a common standard in all the allied states, is declared to be one of the objects of the league.

In order that the nature of the zollverein may be fully seen I will append to my remarks a translation of the more important clauses of the customs treaty of March 22, 1833, as I find it in the work I have heretofore mentioned, which clearly present the articles of that union.

WILL THE SOUTHERN COUNTRIES JOIN US IN SUCH A UNION

It may be that some of the southern countries at first will hesitate to join us in such a league, as was the case at the beginning of the German league, but if only a few of those nations would join us at the beginning, I have no doubt all others, seeing the mutual advantages which would flow from such a union, would eventually seek admission into the alliance. This was the history of the German Zollverein. Yeates, in his work on Recent and Existing Commerce, when discussing the Zollverein, says:

Many states delayed joining, in the belief they would lose rather than gain.

* * Others did not like to merge their individuality, trivial as it was, in the convention, and were encouraged in a sort of independence by England and France.

Some who have commented upon this proposition have expressed the belief that the southern countries would not enter into such a union with us, because, as they derive most of their revenue from impost duties, the free introduction of American products would supply their markets and diminish their custom receipts to such an extent as to force them to some new method for collecting revenue. But, sir, if the plan of the German Zollverein is adopted, and we should follow the course pursued by Prussia, no such difficulty will arise. Yeates says:

Prussia made considerable sacrifices to conciliate the numerous German states whose predilections for Austria, jealousy of Prussia, or fears of self-immolation caused them to hesitate in joining the league. Thus, by the stipulation of proceeds according to population, Prussia should have received three-fourths of the tolls, but accepted five-elevenths.

The immense advantages otherwise gained by Prussia as the dominant nation in population, wealth, and industrial development fully compensated for all the sacrifices she made. The enormous advantages which would accrue to us; our superior producing power and capital, and the free introduction of our surplus products in those countries, as well as in many other ways, would undoubtedly far exceed any sacrifices we might make to induce our weaker neighbors to join us in this league. The large increase of our business resulting from our enlarged markets would cause such an increased demand for imports from other countries as would make good any loss of customs revenue by division among the other members of the union.

I shall advert to this question again and show by a comparison of facts and figures, based upon the trade statistics of all the countries which are eligible for membership in the customs league, that we shall gain more by the remission of duties upon our merchandise exported to countries in the zollverein than we shall lose upon the merchandise imported by us from them, and that both we and they shall be gainers as against the countries not admitted into the union.

Several of the southern countries by recently contracting commercial reciprocity treaties with us have manifested a strong desire to establish free commercial relations with us. When the commission authorized at the last session of Congress to gather statistics, &c., of the trade of those countries were in the City of Mexico a few weeks ago President Diaz assured the commission that his government was disposed to do everything possible to build up the trade and to facilitate the commercial relations of the two countries. He said Mexico is disposed and prepared to go as far in this direction as the Government of the United States.

The World's International Exposition at New Orleans would have been an auspicious occasion for the assemblage of such a meeting of representatives as is here contemplated, and had this proposition been adopted, as I urged in this House at the last session, time enough would have been afforded for the appointment of representatives by all the governments concerned. Even now its speedy adoption as an amend-ment to this bill would impress the agents and visitors from these countries to the New Orleans Exposition with its importance and practicability, and when they return to their home governments they would no doubt be largely instrumental in securing their favorable action. Some idea of the interest which they have taken in that exposition can be ascertained from the fact that Mexico appropriated $200,000 for her exhibits there, and has erected on the exposition grounds two large and magnificent buildings in the Mexican style of architecture.

But, sir, even if the representatives of those governments when they assemble should determine that it is unwise or inexpedient to establish such a union and separate without further action, much good would still result from this assemblage in directing the thoughts of the people of those lands to the benefits which will result to the general welfare by the cultivation of more intimate acquaintance and closer commercial relations than now exist.

EFFECT OF THE UNION ON OUR TRADE WITH WEST INDIES, CHINA, ETC.

The successful establishment of this union would lead to better trade relations with the West Indies and the countries bordering the Pacific Ocean, by means of which, if we do not outstrip Europe in those markets, we may at least obtain the share in that trade which our juxtaposition to those countries and our similarity of political institutions justify.

Of the $247,938,694 imported into the West Indies only $33,300,832 came from the United States.

The countries lying in and around the Pacific, facing the west coast of the United States, imported $529,553,000, of which the United States supplied the sum of only $20,497,000, or less than 4 per cent.

RICH RESULTS TO UNITED STATES.

If this Government will lead the way and secure this alliance with the southern countries we will speedily realize the rich results which will flow from the present southward tendency of material develop-ment, such as the projected routes across the isthmus connecting the two oceans, the extension of our railway system to the City of Mexico, the projected intercontinental railway through Southern Mexico and the fourteen other republics of Central and South America, the steamship lines in operation and projected from our Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific ports to the Spanish-American ports and the countries in the Pacific.

CAN NOT BE ACCOMPLISHED BY WAR.

What we may achieve by this union can never be conquered by war. We want their friendship and trade. They can be obtained by the arts of peace, but not by the arts of war. For these purposes the pen is indeed mightier than the sword. Treat the southern countries as sisters in an American family of nations and they will follow our lead with love and pride. Such a policy will give us a position and power in the history of the world far greater and more enduring than that which Rome ever achieved by bloody conquests. Her policy provoked the hatred of the world, and she ruled it only so long as she was able to wield the sword of the world.

Peace hath her victories No less renowned than war,

WHO WILL OPPOSE THIS PROPOSITION?

Now, who is there here that will oppose such a scheme? Will any advocate of protection do so? Surely he will not, for it extends the line of protection beyond the borders of the United States and embraces all the southern nations. It protects our manufactures not only against European competition in the United States, but also in Mexico, Central and South America. A protectionist who would oppose this proposal would advocate restrictions upon the commercial freedom among the States of this Republic.

Will any advocate of free trade oppose this proposition? Certainly he will not, for it enlarges the area of free trade and demonstrates its advantages over a restricted market.

Our farmers, mechanics, and capitalists are not afraid of competition from those southern countries. The only class who seem to hesitate moving in the direction I have indicated are politicians, who fear to grapple with new questions. Some of them are too busy in the pursuit of office to bestow attention and study upon questions broad enough to embrace a consideration of our commercial relations with the world.

This is not a partisan political question; it rises higher than partisan-ship; it is a question of the highest statesmanship. I am, however, convinced that the party which shows itself possessed of wisdom and progressiveness sufficient to enable it to rise above merely domestic issues and lead the way to securing our rightful share in the commerce of the world will in the future be awarded the greater glory and renown.

APPENDIX VI.

The subjoined translation of the more important clauses of the customs treaty of March 22, 1833, sets the principles on which the German Zollverein is founded in a clear point of view:

Customs treaty, concluded March 22, 1833, between the Kings of Bavaria and Wirtemberg on the one part and the King of Prussia, the Prince Electoral Co-Regent of Hesse, and the Grand Duke of Hesse on the other part.

Customs treaty, concluded March 22, 1833, between the Kings of Bavaria and Wirtemberg on the one part and the King of Prussia, the Prince Electoral Co-Regent of Hesse, and the Grand Duke of Hesse on the other part.

I. The existing customs-union between the states above named shall henceforth constitute a general union, united by a common system of customs and commerce, embracing all the countries comprised therein.

II. In this general reunion are also comprised the states which have already adhered, either for the whole of their territory or for a part, to the system of customs and commerce of one or other of the contracting states, having regard to their special relations, founded upon the conventions of adhesion concluded with the states which have intervened.

III. But there will remain excluded from the general reunion the parts separated from the countries of the contracting states which, because of their studies of most of the contracting states which, because of their studies of most of the contracting states which, because of their studies of one to facilitate the commerce of these territories with the principal country will be maintained. Other favors of this kind can not be accorded without the unanimous consent of the contracting states.

IV. In the contracting states there shall be established uniform laws for the duties of import, of export, and of transit, except such modifications as, without injury to the common object, result necessarily from the particular legislation of each contracting state or from local interests. Thus, exceptions and modifications to the common tariff may take place as to rates of duties of entry or export and of transit (according as the direction of the routes of commerce may require) established upon articles recognized as of minor consequence in extensive commerce; provided always that these modifications be preferred by separate states, and that they shall not be disadvantageous to the general interests of the association.

The administration of the duties of impor

duties established by Article VII, the transport of articles of commerce, subject by the common tariff to duties of import or export on the frontiers of the association, can not take place between the states of Bavaria and Wirtemberg and the states of Prussia, of Electoral Hesse, or of Grand Ducal Hesse, and reciprocally, except by the public roads, military routes, and navigable rivers. For this purpose there shall be established on the interior frontiers common bureaus of verification, to which the conductors of merchandise must, on exhibiting their licenses, declare what are the articles which they are employed to transport from one territory to another.

This disposition will not be applicable to retail commerce in raw materials, nor to the petty commerce of the frontiers or the fairs, nor to the effects of travelers. Process for the verification of merchandise will go no further than is required for security of the duties of compensation. (See Article VII, b.)

XIII. The contracting parties reciprocally renew their adhesion to the principle that the tolls or other charges in lieu thereof shall only be sufficient to defray the expense of maintenance and repairs of the roads, whether the tax be for the state or for private rights. It was thus that has been approved the supplement to the duty of customs created in Bavaria and Wirtemberg to replace the duty of tolls, paving, causeways, bridges, and generally of all analogous taxes.

The tolls for approved the pression according to the general tariff of 1892.

place the duty of tolls, paving, causeways, origges, and generally of all analogous taxes.

The tolls, &c., now existing in Prussia, according to the general tariff of 1828, shall be considered as the highest rates, and shall not be exceeded in any of the contracting states.

In accordance with the principle thus announced, the individual duty for closing the gates of cities shall be abolished, as also the duty of paving of causeways where it still exists, and all paved roads will be considered as causeways of a description liable only to the duty on causeways established by the general tariff of a description liable only to the duty on causeways established by the general tariff.

XIV. The contracting governments agree to unite their efforts to introduce into the states a uniform system of coins, weights, and measures, to commence immediately after the requisite negotiations for this purpose, and subsequently to direct their efforts toward the adoption of uniform custom-house weights.

The contracting states, in the impossibility of establishing this uniformity before this treaty goes into operation, agree, for facilitating the forwarding of merchandise where it has not already been done, to revise their tariff as to weights and measures, assuming for a basis the tariffs of the other contracting states. They will cause such modification to be published, for the government of the public and of their custom-house bureaus.

The common tariff (Article IV) shall be divided into two principal divisions, according to the system of weights, measures, and moneys of Bavaria and that of Prussia.

The declaration of the weights and measures of articles subject to duty shall,

The common tariff (Article IV) shall be divided into two principal divisions, according to the system of weights, measures, and moneys of Bavaria and that of Prussia.

The declaration of the weights and measures of articles subject to duty shall; in Prussia, be according to Prussian weights and measures; in Bavaria and Wurtennburg, according to those of Bavaria; and in the two Hesses, according to the weights and measures there legally established. In expediting custom-house acts the quantity of merchandise must be expressed according to the two principal divisions of the common tariff.

Until the contracting states agree upon a system of common money the payment of duties in each state shall be made in the same currency as in use for payment of its other taxes. But from the present time the gold and silver coins of all the contracting states, with the exception of small money (Scheidomānze), shall be received in all the bureaus of receipt of the association, and for this purpose tables of value shall be published.

XV. The duties of navigation upon the rivers, comprising therein those which apply to vessels, shall always be mutually acquitted according to the acts of the congress of Vienna or of special conventions, upon all the rivers to which these regulations apply, unless other determinations be adopted in this respect.

The contracting states agree to enter without delay into negotiations for that which particularly regards the navigation upon the Rhine and the neighboriug streams, in order to effect an arrangement by which the import, export; and transit of the productions of all the states of the union upon said streams shall be, if not absolutely free, at least relieved as far as possible from duties of navigation, under the reserve of charges of reconnaissance.

All the advantages granted by one state of the union to its subjects in the exercise of the navigation upon said streams shall extend equally to the navigation of the other associated states.

Upon the other associated states.

Upon the other

the subjects of each state may enjoy as extensively as possible the privilege of seeking work and occupation in every other state.

From the coming into operation of the present treaty the subjects of any one of the contracting states trading or seeking employ in the territory of any other of those states shall not be subject to any impost which does not equally affect the native similarly employed. Manufacturers and merchants who are only making purchases for their trade, or travelers who have not goods with them, but simply patterns for the purpose of soliciting commissions, shall not, when thus employed, have any duty to pay in another state if authorized to carry on such commerce in the state where they have their domicile, or if employed in the service of native manufacturers or merchants.

When trading in the markets and fairs or when they are selling the produce of the soil and fabrics, in any one of the states of the association, the subjects of the other contracting states shall be treated in all respects as subjects of the same state.

of the soll and fabries, in any one of the states of the association, the subjects of the other contracting states shall be treated in all respects as subjects of the same state.

XIX. The seaports of Prussia shall be open for commerce to all the subjects of the states of the union on payment of the same duties as are paid by Prussian subjects, and the consuls of the several states in the seaports or places of foreign commerce shall be bound, in cases of need, to assist with their advice and support the subjects of other contracting states.

XX. To protect against contraband their common custom-house system, and to insure the regular payment of the duty of consumption in the interior, the contracting states have concluded a reciprocal cartel, which shall be enforced as soon as possible, but, at the furthest, at the same time with the present treaty, XXI. The community of receipts of the contracting states, stipulated by the present treaty, shall comprehend the product of duties of entry, of export, and of transit, in the Prussian states, the Kingdoms of Bavaria and Wirtemberg, the Electorate, and the Grand Duchy of Hesse, comprising therein those countries which have down to the present time acceded to the custom-house system of the contracting states.

The following are excluded from the community of receipts and remain reserved for the particular benefit of the respective governments:

1. The impost collected in the interior of each state of indigenous products, comprising therein the compensatory duties reserved in Article XI.

2. The toll on rivers, to which are applicable the regulations of the acts of the congress of Vienna or special conventions. (Article XV.)

3. Duties of paving, of causeways, of bridges, of ferries, of canals, of locks and ports, charges of weighing and storage, as well as similar receipts, whatever may be their name.

4. The fines and confiscations which, beyond the part allowed to informers, remain the property of each government throughout its territory.

XIII. The produce of the d mon conventions.

The population of every state which has entered or may enter into the association by treaty with one or other of the contracting states, under the engagement made by the latter to make an annual contribution for the participation of the former to the common revenue of the customs, shall be added to the population of the states which make this contribution.

There shall be made every three years, dating from a period to be hereafter fixed, an exact emuneration of the population of the associated states; the states shall reciprocally communicate the results thereof.

XXIII. All restitutions of duties not authorized by the legislation of the customs shall remain charged to the treasury of the government which shall have granted it.

toms shall remain charged to the treasury of the government which shall have granted it.

Conventions hereafter to be concluded will regulate in what cases similar Conventions hereafter to be concluded will regulate in what cases similar restitution may be accorded.

XXIV. In conformity with the object of this association of customs tending to facilitate a freer and more natural commercial intercourse, the favors accorded for the payment of custom-house duties at certain places in which fairs are held, especially the privileges of abatement (rabat privilegien), can not be extended to those states of the association where they do not exist. On the contrary, they shall be restricted and abolished as far as possible, regard being had to the means of subsistence of the places heretofore favored, and to the commercial relations which they have with foreigners; but others can on no account be granted without the general consent of the contracting parties.

XXXIII. There shall every year, on June 1, be an assembly of plenipotentiaries of the governments of the union, empowered generally to deliberate, and each state may send thither a duly authorized representative.

The plenipotentiaries will choose from among themselves a president, who, however, shall have no pre-cuminence over the other members.

The first assembly shall be held at Munich.

At the close of each annual assembly the place of next meeting will be determined, having reference to the nature of those subjects which will then come under discussion.

XXXIV. The assembly of plenipotentiaries will have under its consideration under discussion.

XXXIV. The assembly of plenipotentiaries will have under its consideration the following subjects:

a. To consider the complaints which may have arisen in any of the states of the association concerning the execution of the general treaty, of special conventions, of the law, and of custom-house regulations, also of the tariff, when these shall not have been adjusted during the year by correspondence between the different ministers.

b. The definitive reparation among the states of the union of the total common receipts, based upon the observations made by the superior authorities, and verified by the central bureau, as may be rendered necessary by the common interests.

c. To deliberate upon propositions and suggestions made by the governments for the perfection of the administration.

d. Discussions upon alterations, demanded by any of the contracting states, in the laws, tariff, and custom-house regulations, as well as in the organization of the administration, and in general upon the development and perfection of the general system of customs and commerce.

XXXV. If in the course of the year, when the plenipotentiaries are not in session, extraordinary incidents should occur which require prompt decision on the part of the states of the union, the contracting parties will consult upon these through their diplomatic agents, or they will order an extra sitting of their plenipotentiaries.

Recent changes in the German customs-union.—The discussions in the assemblies of the league were, especially of late years, a good deal influenced by political considerations. A league denominated the Steuerverein had been formed in opposition to, or in rivalry with, the Prussian league by Hanover, Oldenburg, and Brunswick. It was evident, however, inasmuch as the interests of these and the other German states were identical, that it would be a great public advantage were these associations merged into one. But, owing to political, commercial, and financial jealousies, this desirable object was of very difficult attainment. At length these difficulties were surmounted, and a treaty negotiated between Hanover and Prussia on September 7, 1851, provided for the incorporation, from January 1, 1854, of the former, and the other states included in the Steuerverein, with the Prussian union. Some modifications were introduced by the treaty into the basis of the league, but they are of little importance except to the parties immediately interested.

Treaties with Austria.—More recently a great deal of discussion took place between Prussia and the subordinate German states on the one hand and Austria on the other in regard to the formation of a customs association which should include the latter; and in order to pave the way for this desirable consummation Austria issued a new tariff on November 25, 1851, in which she made many important modifications in the prohibitive system, on which she had previously acted at the same time that she established a free commercial intercourse between Hungary (which had previously a separate customs establishment) and the other states of the Empire. And though this wise and liberal measure has not yet led to the incorporation of Austria into the customs-union, it has led to the conclusion by her of several important commercial treaties. The first of these with Prussia was dated February 19, 1853.

The contracting parties engaged to suppress, with a few specified exceptions, all prohibitions against importing the products of the one into the territories of the other. They next established a complete freedom of trade between the two countries in all articles of raw produce; and they further stipulated that the duties to be imposed on manufactured products should be moderate and reasonable. It had a variety of other clauses, all of a liberal character. The duration of the treaty was limited to twelve years, so that it had expired and was renewed before hostilities broke out between Prussia and Austria. The war of 1866 affected the trade of Germany most injuriously, and by way of illustration we subjoin a statement referring to 1855 and 1866.

Renewal of the Zollverein.—The German states lying to the south of the river Maine, having preserved their independence after the war of 1866, were not under any obligation to unite themselves, either politically or commercially, with Prussia, or even to renew the Zollverein, which the war had dissolved. However, a sense of their own interest subsequently induced the southern states not only to enter into military conventions with the Prussian Crown, but to continue members of the Zollverein upon an enlarged basis. On July 8, 1867, a new Zollverein treaty for a further term of years was concluded between the states of the North German Confederation and the South German states, namely, Bavaria, Wirtemberg, Baden, and Hesse-Darmstadt, the scope of which extends to the whole of Germany except Austria, inasmuch as the two Mecklenburgs and the three Hanse Towns, as members of the northern confederation, are parties to the last-mentioned treaty and are represented in the Zollverein councils.

and the three Hanse Towns, as members of the northern confederation, are parties to the last-mentioned treaty and are represented in the Zollverein councils.

Under the old system, questions were settled in the Zollverein confederation, are which unanimity was required; whereas under the new treaty the legislative power is given to a federal council of fifty-eight members, in conjunction with a customs parliament. In the council Prussia has seventeen votes and a veto upon all alterations of existing laws; in other cases the majority of the council decides, Prussia having a casting vote. The customs parliament (which met for the first time in Berlin on April 27, 1858) is chosen upon the principle of universal suffrage by the people of the southern states, as well as of the states of the north will enjoy their due influence in the council of the new customs-union, and that the public opinion of the nation will be fully and fairly represented in the customs parliament.

A difficulty in the way of the accession of the two Mecklenburgs to the Zollverein system was found to exist in their treaty of 1865 with France, by the eight-eenth article of which the Mecklenburgs had engaged not to raise their customs duties above the rate of $1 per centure, and not to introduce any new duties whatever. This difficulty has been removed. Prussia has consented to a reduction of the customs tariff on French wines and some other articles; and the two Mecklenburgs are left at liberty to enter the customs frontier of the North German Confederation, and to fulfill all their engagements as members of that alliance. The arrangements for that purposes are expected to be soon completed by the federal council, and the early admission of the two Mecklenburgs within the customs line may now be anticipated.

Schleswig and Holstein retained their old tariff for some time after their annexation to the Prussian monarchy, but toward the end of April, 1867, a royal ordinance put the Zollverein tariff into force within both duchies; and on November

The export duties (with two or three exceptions) as well as the transit duties, are on both sides abolished. Of the advantages of the last treaty with the Zollverein, the united kingdom will partake in consequence of the "most favored nation clause" in our treaty with Austria. (Treaties, Austria.) A treaty of navigation with Italy had been previously concluded on October 14, 1867, and more recently, March 30, 1868, a treaty of commerce and navigation with Spain has been announced, whereby the Zollverein has the right of trading on the most favored footing with the European portion of the Spanish monarchy, and has conceded reciprocal privileges to Spain in the states of the union. The differential duties which have hitherto existed in Spain in favor of certain articles of French produce and manufacture have likewise been abolished in favor of the Zollverein.

In consequence of these and other changes the duties in the tariff of the Ger-

Zollverein.

In consequence of these and other changes the duties in the tariff of the German customs-union have undergone many modifications. But except on coarse and heavy goods they continue, speaking generally to be moderate. A declaration of April, 1869, for the admission duty free into Great Britain and the Zollverein of patterns and samples imported by commercial travelers has been published in the London Gazette.

The overtures made to Russia on behalf of the Zollverein have hitherto been unsuccessful. (Report of Mr. Ward, minister resident at Hamburg, of May 15, 1868,)

We have little doubt, should peace be preserved, that the advantages of which the Zollverein must be productive will be so many and so great that it will lay the foundations of a lasting intercourse of which we can neither foresee the extent nor the beneficial influence.

Issue of Circulating Notes.

SPEECH

HON. GEORGE E. SENEY,

OF OHIO.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, January 15, 1885,

On the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations.

Mr. SENEY said:
Mr. SPEAKER: The bill before the House proposes to change, in a very important particular, the national banking law. Under section 5171 of the act a national banking association, upon a deposit of United States bonds, is entitled to have circulating notes not exceeding in amount 90 per cent. of the par value of the bonds.

The pending bill proposes to give to these associations circulating notes equal in amount to the par value of the bonds deposited. The processity for making this change in the law is not very apparent. Re-necessity for making this change in the law is not very apparent. flecting upon the subject, with some care, I am unable to see why this change should be made. That the change, if made, will be to the advantage of the national banks no one, it is believed, will doubt. Most unquestionably it will add to the value of their franchises.

The change in the law will give to these banks 10 per cent. more of circulation than they are entitled to have under the law as it now and they are that too more the banks not the state of t and that, too, upon the bonds now on deposit as well as those hereafter to be deposited. The 10 per cent. of increase in circulation these banks will use at profitable rates in their business. If this measure has any other purpose than to enable national banks to add to their dividends, I hope it will be pointed out by those who would legislate in the interests of these moneyed institutions. I can not persuade myself to believe that any interests except those of the owners of national banks lieve that any interests except those of the owners of national banks will be promoted if the proposed change in the law is made.

Why should we make a law to increase the gains of those who hold the capital stock in the 2,671 national banks of the country? Is there any good reason why the money-making capacity of these banks should be increased? Shall we give to them rights and privileges more valuable than those they now have? In a word, ought we to legislate into the hands of these shareholders capital with which to do business? That these banking associations desire this advantageous legislation is no reason why we should enset the pending hill into a law. All other in these banking associations desire this advantageous legislation is no reason why we should enact the pending bill into a law. All other interests of the country, I venture, are indifferent, if not opposed, to the proposed change in the law. No person outside of national banking circles asks for the change. Is it not our duty to move slowly and surely when legislating in the interests of the few? Special or class legislation should not be done hastily.

The national banking system is supposed to be a good one. Perhaps

The national banking system is supposed to be a good one. Perhaps none better could be devised. At this time it ought not to be disturbed. Let it alone for the present. If the system is to be disturbed, it ought to be in the interests of better management and more security for depositors. It cought not to be disturbed in the interest of the banks. They ought to be content with what they have, without ask-ing for anything more. The business of banking, under the national banking law, has been, and still is, prosperous and highly satisfactory in its returns. While other business interests are dull, and in many instances prostrate, there is little, if any, diminution in the profits of the national banks. So far as the public have knowledge, these institutions are sound and safely managed. There may be some that are not. It is to be hoped that the number is few. If we are to have banks of issue, let us be content, for the present at least, with those that we have and as they are. If more legislation is needed to perfect the national banking system, there are interests beside that of the shareholders to be considered.

The question before us has more than one side. Those who deposit their money in national banks have an interest in the legislation pro-posed by this bill to which we ought not to be indifferent. In voting upon this measure we must choose between the interests of the share-holders upon the one hand and the interests of the depositors and the public upon the other. That more legislation is needed to protect de-positors in these institutions against loss from the inexcusable neglect and criminal conduct of stockholders, directors, and officers no one can deny. If, then, we are to legislate for all interests instead of for one? If, then, we are to legislate upon this subject, why not legislate

Is it said that no interests will be harmed if the national banks are allowed to increase their circulation 10 per cent. above the 90 per cent authorized by existing laws? Let us consider this question for a moment. So far as the bill-holder is concerned he is protected against loss. For his bill the act provides that upon default of payment by the bank issuing it, it shall be paid in lawful money upon presentation at the United States Treasury. The act further provides the research of the bonk devocited to secure the bank's circulation is at the United States Treasury. The act further provides that in case the proceeds of the bonds deposited to secure the bank's circulation is the proceeds of the bonds deposited to secure the bank's circulation is insufficient to reimburse the Government for the amount expended in paying the bank's circulating notes, then, for the deficiency, the Government shall have a first lien upon all of the bank's assets, and the deficiency shall be made good to the Government, out of these assets, in preference to any and all other claims whatsoever, except the costs and expenses of administering upon the assets. It will be seen, therefore, that if the circulation is equal to the par value of the bonds deposited a loss may occur and when it does the depositors must hear if

Authorize the circulation to be equal to the par value of the bonds deposited, and should evil come to a bank, unless its deposit bonds are at a premium, there will be a loss which the depositors must make good. In other words, the depositors in a national bank stand as security to the Government for the loss, when the bonds on deposit do not sell for enough to redeem the outstanding circulation of the bank and pay the costs to which the bill-holders are subjected in getting lawful money for their protested bills. And what security have the depositors for the payment of what the Government takes from them for the bill-holders, or for their own deposits? What remains, after the claims of the Government are satisfied, and after the Government's receiver and all of his servants, clerks, agents, and attorneys are paid in full, and after all other costs and expenses of converting the assets into money are settled, is dealt out to the depositors. is dealt out to the depositors

When a national bank fails and has but few assets their depositors realize, and so, too, does the public, that banking institutions organized under Federal law and bearing the name national are not any safer depositories for money than those doing business under a less pretentious title, and under laws made nearer their homes.

The depositors, then, are interested in the securities held by the Government for the redemption of circulation. When it is proposed to increase the circulation to the par value of the bonds, the depositors have an interest in the subject too important to be overlooked. Change the law are this bill proposed to the security for deposits is Change have an interest in the subject too important to be overlooked. Change the law as this bill proposes, and the security for deposits is lessened 10 per cent. The risk in depositing money in banks should not be increased by legislation. In legitimate banking, banks intentionally take no risks. When they loan money they exact security. When money is loaned to them the law under which they do business ought to provide all the security for its payment consistent with just and upright vide all the security for its payment consistent with just and dealing.

It will be said that depositors in national banks have a security in addition to the assets of the bank. It is true that the shareholders in these banks are individually liable, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all the debts of the bank to the extent of the amount of their stock at its par value in addition to the amount invested in their stock. With this security, good as it may be, depositors in national banks have failed to realize all of their dues. They need further security for their deposits. If legislation can give it, it ought not to be withheld. Remove the limitation upon the individual liability of the shareholders and the security for deposits would be largely increased. shareholders and the security for deposits would be largely increased. As a rule, laws creating and regulating corporations exempt or limit the individual liability of its members. With this rule I would not in-there unless to make banks exercising corporate powers an exception.

There is a necessity, I admit, for limiting the liability of shareholders in most corporations. There is no necessity for limiting their liability in banking corporations. The business of banking is not an experiin banking corporations. The business of banking is not an experiment or a venture. It is not what is called an enterprise. There is no other business in which profit is more certain and sure. The risks are few; less, it is believed, than those of dealers in merchandise, at whole-sale or retail. Their gains are supposed to be greater, and ordinarily their losses are less. Deposits in banks, to a large extent, are induced by a special trust and confidence in their safety. Receiving, as banks do, the money of hundreds and thousands, under a promise to repay upon demand, why should not all that their owners have be held to make good the promise? good the promise?

In adding to the value of banking, under corporate laws, ought we not to lessen the risk of those who leave money on deposit? Why should the owners of an incorporated bank be exempt from the liability imposed upon all unincorporated banks and imposed, too, upon merchants, traders, and all others engaged in ordinary business pursuits? Why should the people have less security for their deposits when made in a national bank than when made in a private bank? An individual is liable for all the debts he contracts. Two or more persons doing business together are severally and jointly bound for their debts. The principal is liable for the contracts of his agent made within the scope of the agency. This is believed to be the common law throughout the world.

agency. This is believed to be the common law throughout the world.

According to the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency there are 7,448 banks and bankers in this country. Of this number, 2,308 are national banks, 1,728 are State banks, savings-banks, and trust companies, and 3,412 are private banks. As to the personal liability of the stockholders in these State and savings-banks and trust companies, I am not informed. All, I judge, are incorporated institutions. It is, therefore, not without pretense to say that in no case are the stockholders individually liable for the contracts of these corporations beyond twice the amount of their stock. From this report it appears that in nearly one-half of the places where money is left on deposit there is unlimited personal liability for its payment, while in the remaining half this liability exceeds in no case double the amount of capital stock. These banks of limited individual liability have six and a half dollars on deposit to one dollar on deposit in the banks of unlimited individual liability. In the interests of the people, and to protect them against loss, all limitations upon the liability of those who receive their money under an agreement to pay back on demand ought to be removed. Further than this, probably, legislation need not go. This far it ought to go. Those who own incorporated banks should be liable individually for all obligations the banks contract. The interests of the public require this measure of responsibility.

This may be an advance step, but it is a step in the right direction. The best interests of the people demand that it be taken. Some may refuse to join in a rightful movement against corporate interests. Others will move, if at all, with reluctance. Still the movement will go on with the approbation of the people until the members of banking corporations are subjected to the same rule of liability the law imposes upon all who do business without corporate powers. Few national banks, comparatively, have closed their doors against depositors, but when they have wreck and ruin were behind. Under existing laws the rights of depositors against the banking institutions of the country differ. Our legislation can do much to make the law of liability uniform. If a depositor puts his money into an unincorporated bank, all that its owners have may be subjected in payment. If he leaves his money in an incorporated bank, a part only of what its owners have can be seized. The balance, in many cases large, is secured to the owner, free from the depositor's touch and free from the law's process. Upon this balance the owner lives in affluence, while his unpaid depositor struggles through

This is not an exaggerated statement. Cases like this are not few. Many such are to be found here and there throughout the country. Against such wrongs I complain, and against the legislation that makes them possible I protest. Unjust legislation may be borne for a time, but sooner or later it gives way under the pressure of right. Individual liability of the owners of incorporated banks may not in all cases secure to their depositors their money, but in many instances it will make good what they would otherwise lose. Banking institutions are a public necessity, and the interests of the public should be protected to the extent that it can be done by legislation.

When those who own and control banks are held personally liable for what the banks do, better will be their management and more faithful and vigilant will their interests and the interests of those dealing

When those who own and control banks are held personally liable for what the banks do, better will be their management and more faithful and vigilant will their interests and the interests of those dealing with them be guarded. I know full well that in legislating to make stockholders in national banks individually liable for the engagements of the bank the liability of stockholders in the banks now organized would continue as fixed by existing laws. But in national banks organized after individual liability is imposed the stockholders would be subject to its rule. The security of depositors in national banks now organized, as well as those hereafter organized, would be strengthened by making more severe existing penalties against embezzlement and the misappropriation and unauthorized use of the bank's property, and by imposing heavy penalties upon stockholders and directors for a failure to make stated examinations into the condition and management of their bank. With these convictions as to what is due to those who put their money on deposit in national banks no measure which lessens the security they now have for its payment can have my support.

curity they now have for its payment can have my support.

It will be urged, I know, that the credit of the Government is so high that its bonds sell at a premium, and that, therefore, there can be no risk in giving to the national banks circulation equal in amount to the par value of the bonds. The statement is common that the bonds of the Government will never be worth less than par, and that, therefore, the Government will never have occasion to take any part of the assets of a national bank from the depositors to reimburse it for loss in redeeming circulation. The value of our bonds depends more upon the future than upon the present condition of the country. He who states the mark at which these bonds will stand next year, or the year thereafter, or five or twenty years hence, talks about that which we all know he knows nothing about. Will the present value of these bonds be maintained always? In time of peace and plenty all believe that they will. Should war come, or a general disturbance in monetary affairs materially weaken confidence and trust, all paper values will shrink. Either or both of these calamities, much as we may wish or strive to avoid them, may come upon us.

We know not what a day may bring forth. It is within the recollection of all when the public debt grew in a single year from ninety millions to five hundred million dollars, and in three years thereafter it reached nearly three thousand million dollars. We should not for get that there was a time within the last twenty years when gold was worth nearly three times as much as the legal-tender issues of the Government. Then a bond of the Government having a par value of $285 maturing in three years, and bearing 7.3 per cent. interest per anumy was worth no more than one hundred gold dollars. Devoutly as it may be wished that the public credit may never fall below the great standard of value, still it may. And who can say that it will not? Our currency may depreciate in value, and so, too, all public securities. Legislating as we are to-day about the currency, we would be und mindful of our duty did we fail to look upon the dark as well as the bright side of the near or remote future.

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against this bill, not because I am unfriendly to national banks, or their owners, for I am not, but because it is a species of legislation to which I am unalterably opposed. The legislation proposed by the bill is of a very special character. If it were in the interest of capital generally, and without particularizing, it would be less objectionable. But it is in the interest of capital invested in the shares of national banks. No other interests does the bill propose to benefit, except that of the owners of national banks. The mere passage of this bill will increase the value of national-bank shares, but nothing will it add to the value of any other property. This bill, should it become a law, will put into the hands of those who have capital invested in the stock of national banks $32,000,000. Upon the mere demand of these banks they will be entitled to receive from the Government this large sum of money upon their bonds now on deposit. The only consideration the banks pay for the use of this money for twenty years is 1 per cent. per annum, which is imposed as a tax upon circulation. This money the banks will loan at their counters—in my State at 8 per cent., in other States at rates less or more. It is safe to say that the national banks in the use of this $32,000,000 will make yearly, for twenty years to come, less the annual tax of 1 per cent., $2,000,000.

Who but the Government will loan money at 1 per cent. per annum? And to whom does the Government loan money, at any rate, low or high, except to the national banks? These banks give their money to the Government in exchange for the Government bonds bearing 3, 3½, 4, and 4½ per cent. interest per annum, and the Government gives its money to these banks at 1 per cent. per annum. This is said to be wise and good financiering for the Government. Fortunate, indeed, that the Government is strong and has the ability to stand such a drain upon its resources. An individual doing business upon the same plan would soon involve himself in bankruptcy and ruin.

But why should the Government furnish capital to a person, natural

But why should the Government furnish capital to a person, natural or artificial, with which to do business? If to the national banks, why not to banks organized under State laws? If to one class of incorporated banks, why not to another; why not to banks not incorporated? If to one person or corporation, why not to another? Capital may well congratulate itself upon the loyalty of its law-making friends.

rated banks, why not to another; why not to banks not incorporated? If to one person or corporation, why not to another? Capital may well congratulate itself upon the loyalty of its law-making friends.

Labor has no measure pending before Congress to add $2,000,000 a year for twenty years to its present earnings. If it had, what, may I ask, would be the chances for it to become a law? If we would legislate the use of $32,000,000 for twenty years to the workingmen and working-women of the country, many homes, needy and deserving, would be made cheerful and happy. Instead of improving the condition of those whose condition needs improvement, we better the condition of those who need no help. According to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency there are 2,671 national banks. The stockholders in these institutions, probably, do not exceed in number 100,000. Under this bill, the yearly dividends of these stockholders will be increased $2,000,000. In twenty years these increased dividends will amount to $40,000,000.

This bill, should it become a law, will put money into the purse of 100,000 persons. There are 50,000,000 people in this country, to whom this bill, if made a law, will be no benefit. Still it is pressed. Capital demands its passage. The few who have money invested in national-bank stock insist upon more protection to their interests.

Mr. Speaker, we hear much said, and glibly, too, here and before the polytical polyt

Mr. Speaker, we hear much said, and glibly, too, here and before the people, about the relations of capital and labor and of their respective rights, interests, duties, and responsibilities. In the recent political contest each of the two great parties proclaimed themselves to be the friend of labor and of laboring men.

The utterances upon the stump and in the partisan press were so frequent and strong, that the average hearer and reader were unable to determine which of the two parties, if intrusted with power, would do the most for labor and the least for capital. Then, all past legislation in the interest of capital was sought to be excused upon any and every

What legislation had done to increase the profits of labor required little time to tell. Promises were made and promises were taken that in the future labor should fare better than in the past. We are here fresh from the people and find capital again in its accustomed seat at the front, and labor in its usual seat, at the rear.

A recent cartoon in Punch shows a meeting between capital and labor before the election, and a meeting between capital and labor after the election. It must be seen to be appreciated; it can not be described. The picture has capital greeting labor warmly and cordially. This is before the election. After the election capital, in the words of the of labor it may be truly said that as yet it has put in no appearance in Senate or House. Seldom does it appear in either body. Capital we have with us always, and will, I suppose, as long as the Government endures. It intrudes upon this floor and into yonder Chamber. It crowds the corridors inside of this building and fills all of the outside Every department of the Government is pestered with its Capital is here to-day asking the representatives of the people to legisits interest. The national banks want us to do something for Much has legislation done for capital in the past. Largely have late in its interest. our laws added to corporate wealth. Lands acquired by the blood and treasure of the people have been given away, without stint or measure, to railroad corporations. These more than princely gifts have made some of these monopolies so arrogant that they would defy the legislation which they are unable to dictate. We have reason to believe that the day of their imperious rule is nearing its end.

In dealing with the corporations to whom we have been so generous we should meet every expectation of the people. With no unfriendliness to capital we can, as we should, oppose its exacting demands. Without disturbing in the least particular the national banking law, or the interests of those who own the capital stock of national banks, we may well refuse to enact a law which will give to this stock a we may well retuse to enact a law which will give to this stock a value which its own earnings are unable to do. Legislation such as this bill proposes ought not to be sought. The interests to be promoted are those of a few persons engaged in a single pursuit. Banking is in no sense an industry, and its relation to labor is too distant to entitle it to what is called "protection." Will this House do for the national banks what the Republican Senate and the Republican House in the last Congress refused to do for the wool-growers of the country? Near two years have passed since the memorable struggle between the woolgrowers and the woolen manufacturers in this Capitol.

The wool-growers, it will be remembered, asked for legislation pro-cting their labor. The woolen manufacturers demanded that their tecting their labor. capital, instead of the wool-growers' labor, should have the protecting care of the Government. The result of this hand-to-hand contest between these conflicting interests is well known to the country. Before the Republican Tariff Commission, in the Senate, and in the House the friends of capital outnumbered and outvoted the friends of labor. duty on woolen manufactures was not disturbed. The duty on wool was lowered near 3 cents per pound. By this legislation the woolen manufacturer buys the wool-grower's wool about 3 cents a pound less than he did for years before. What the wool-growers lose the woolen manufacturers gain. This is but one of the many victories capital has won in its conflicts with labor.

Shall I pause to inquire when, if ever, has labor scored an advantage over capital in a contest before the law-making power of the Govern-What law passed by Congress has lessened the laborer's toil, ment? What law passed by Congress has lessened the laborer's toil, or added a penny to his earnings? If there is one, except the eighthour law, I beg to be informed, here and now. Statute after statute has been passed to make capital profitable. None have been passed giving to labor even what it earns. It is not to be denied that legislation, in many instances, has made employment for labor. This has been done in legislating in the interest of capital, when this interest and that of labor were inseparably connected. More than this has not been done. Beyond furnishing labor employment for capital's use, I know of no legislation directly promoting the interests of labor. Labor has had to be content with its wages. Capital, in addition to its own earnings, exacts all the earnings of labor above the price of a day's work.

When capital and labor, skilled, if not unskilled, work together why should not labor have some share, little though it be, of the profits? What has the average laboring man in middle life to show for his many years of daily toil? Little, indeed, of this world's goods. For the work of to-day he receives about the same wages that he received during all the years that are behind him. In old age strength fails him and his store is scant. But labor and its interests aside. Capital and its interests press on attention.

This bill would be relieved from much that is objectionable did it provide that the national banks should give as well as take. The increase in circulation contemplated by the bill will be worth to the national banks not less than 6 per cent. The tax of 1 per cent. on circulation will reduce the value of this increase to 5 per cent. To equalize the benefits of the bill between the Government and the banks the tax on the increased circulation might be raised to 5 per cent. If this tax is too high, it may be lowered to a figure that will make it equal to the rate of interest which the bonds securing the circulation bear. This view of the question is suggested by the argument of those friendly to the bill, that this measure is a public necessity. If this be true, then I insist that the interests of the public, rather than the interests

Those advocating the interests of shareholders in national banks tell us that circulation upon 90 per cent. of the market value of the bonds deposited is unprofitable. Opposed to this statement is the fact that deposited is unprofitable. Opposed to this statement is the fact that for the year ending November 1, 1884, the outstanding circulation of the national banks was $333,559,813. During this period one hundred and ninety-one national banks were organized, to whom circulation was issued amounting to $3,866,230. Is it not strange that new banks will organize and take circulating notes if circulation is without profit? Another fact is worthy of mention, that we have more national banks to-day than at any other time since the system was established. Still another fact should be stated, that of the ninety national banks whose corporate existence expired during the past year, eighty-three have been extended under the act of July, 1882.

These facts show that there is money in banking under the national banking law. If circulation is not profitable the business seems to have other profits which make dividends satisfactory to stockholders. It is true that there has been a decrease in the circulation of these banks of $8,284,017 in 1883, and of $24,170,676 in 1884. It may be that there will be a decrease in 1885 as large as in 1884. Who can say that this decrease is because circulation is unprofitable? That the circulation of national banks is less profitable now than in years past I am free to admit. This is not because circulation may not be employed at high paying rates. In this respect there has been little, if any, Nor is it because the volume of business has decreased, or the change.

One reason why circulation pays less now than heretofore is because the bonds on deposit to secure it bear interest at 3, 4, and 4½ per cent., instead of 5 and 6. Another reason is that these low-interest bonds are at a high premium, and the money invested in premium is idle and therefore unproductive. Still another reason is that the sum required to be kept at the Treasury to redeem circulation yields no income to the banks. Let it be said that circulation is the least profitable of the business authorized by the law regulating national banks. Is this a reason why legislation should be invoked to make it pay more than it does? These banks loan money at the highest interest rates; buy business paper at its value; discount bills; buy and sell exchange; deal in moneyed securities; receive interest on the bonds deposited for circulation; loan the circulating notes received on these bonds, and make collections in all parts of the country. By these methods and by others the dividends of national banks are earned.

In this reckoning no mention is made of the fact that the system of banking established by the national banking law itself has great com-pensating advantages. The popular belief is that national banks are safe, because supervised by the Government. This inspires the trust and confidence of the people. In addition to this the high character of those by whom, as a rule, they are directly controlled enable these institutions to secure deposits three times in excess of their own capital, which they loan out at high rates of interest. Another advantage is found in the fact that at this time there are 2,671 of these banks in operation. Located as they are, at every point in our vast country where there is banking to do, each uses the other as a correspondent, and this adds largely to their ability to command business at home and Compare the earnings of capital invested in national banks with the earnings of equal capital invested in other legitimate business, and banking capital can make no complaint. Need this feature of the ques-tion be further elaborated? It is a fact known to all men that banking tion be further elaborated? It is a fact known to all men that banking is a very profitable pursuit. What signifies it that circulation is the least in its items of profit? It is not every ware on the shelf of the merchant that sells at a profit. Yet, in merchandising wealth is accumulated. There are times when the products of the farm sell at prices less than remunerative. Yet, in husbandry there are substantial gains. It is not every working-day in the year that the mechanic and the laborer have employment. Still, the year does not come and go without giving some reward. Idle and unprofitable days are not uncommon in professional pursuits. go without giving some reward. I uncommon in professional pursuits.

There is scarcely any business that has not its season of depression.

Instead of complaining, the national banks ought to be gratefully content with their lot. For more than twenty years they have done business upon the capital of their owners, and upon the capital furnished them by the Government, in the shape of their circulating notes, in amount but 10 per cent. less than their own capital, and upon three times the amount of their own capital furnished by their depositors. Upon the capital furnished by the Government these banks pay 1 per cent. per annum. Upon that furnished by depositors it is safe to se that the use of one-half is without cost, and the use of the other half they have at very low rates of interest.

Investing capital in national banks enables its owner to draw interest upon not less than three times the amount invested, while the other business done by the bank, it is believed, goes far toward meeting its operating expenses. Under recent legislation these banks are authorized to continue their business for twenty years longer. If a business having these advantages is not sufficiently remunerative without further help from the Government, its end cannot come too soon. Banking may be more profitable with than without circulation. But it is a significant fact that out of 7,448 banks in our country, only 2,671 have circulation; 4,777 banks manage to get along without circulating notes, and seldom, if ever, do they appear in this Capitol asking for

Mr. Speaker, it is said by the friends of this bill that the public interests require that the national banks should have circulation equal in amount to the par value of the bonds they deposit. Supporting this assertion, it is argued that unless we allow them to increase their circulation to the par value of the bonds deposited they will not only decline to take circulation, but will retire, gradually or otherwise, as their interests may dictate, the circulation they have. All this means, I suppose, that if this bill is not passed all of the national banks will at once set to work contracting their circulation, and not stop until all is retired. This threat should excite no fears. It is true that existing laws give to the national banks an undue control over a large proportion of the currency of the country. This wrong should be remedied. If we are to look to these banks for a part of our currency they should be under a binding obligation to supply it, if needed. In authorizing them to issue circulating notes they should be required to maintain a circulation within fixed limits. The option to maintain or not to main-tain circulation above a minimum amount should not be held by the banks. As the law now stands the business interests of the country are largely under the control of the national banks. Should they contract their circulation, little or much, there is no currency to take its place. One object in establishing the national banking system was to give to the people a safe and sound currency, and sufficient at all times to meet the business wants of the country. If, in this latter respect, the system is to be a failure, the sooner it is so understood the better.

The passage of this bill may increase circulation upon the bonds now The passage of this bill may increase circulation upon the bonds now on deposit $32,000,000. The contraction for two years past is less than $33,000,000. So that this bill may bring the circulation back to where it was two years ago. Will it do more? We will see presently that the only bonds available for deposit to secure circulation are the 4 percents, which mature in 1907. The premium on these bonds is so high that these banks say they can not afford to buy them to deposit for circulation, and for this reason, mainly, the passage of this bill is urged. The passage of this bill will, in my opinion, advance the premium. Banks that object to buying the 4 per cent, bonds at the present high The passage of this bill will, in my opinion, advance the premium. Banks that object to buying the 4 per cent. bonds at the present high premium will surely object to their purchase if the premium should be higher. Five per cent. additional premium will lessen materially the expected gain from 10 per cent. more of circulation.

Facts are stubborn things. It is impossible to change them by this bill. Much as it may be believed that this measure will put a stop to the contraction now going on in national-bank note circulation, my word for it, it will not, nor will it bring back the circulation to the point where it stood one year ago. The circulation of national banks contracting, and will continue to contract, from causes which this bill, if made a law, will be unable to contract, from causes which this bill, if made a law, will be unable to control. The credit of the Gov-ernment this bill can not affect. This high credit is the force before which national-bank notes are retiring. As long as the bonds which secure circulation bear a low rate of interest and command a high premium the circulation of national banks will grow less and less, until sooner or later all are retired. In the light of the present surroundings there is reason to believe that it is only a question of time, and short at that, when the national banks will cease to issue circulating notes. For myself I do not believe that they will for any great length of time be able to maintain a circulation except at a sacrifice of the better interests of the people.

The national banking system when established was supposed to be a necessity of the war. The purpose of the system was to create a home demand for the bonds of the Government, rather than to make a currency system, either temporary or permanent. Before the war banks of issue were authorized by the States, and under their laws currency was issued. The genius of that distinguished citizen of my State, then at the head of the Treasury, the late Chief-Justice Chase, planned the system. The free-banking laws then in force in Ohio and New York, and it may be in other States, were the models used by the great Secretary in molding his work. In making a home demand for the bonds of the Government his labors were a complete success. The unfriendly legislation to banks issuing currency under State authority is a marked feature in the legislation of that period. Without the 10 per cent. tax imposed by Federal law upon bank issues authorized by State laws it is doubtful whether the national banking system would have come into general use. It will be remembered that banking capital was reluctant and slow to organize under the national banking law. Fortunately, the national banking system is no longer a necessary factor in maintaining the supremacy of the laws.

Reliance upon the national banks for our currency means a perpetua tion of the public debt. To this public sentiment, as I understand it, is opposed. The gradual payment of the public debt is favored by the great body of the people. All legislation tending to make the public debt permanent, or postponing its payment to a too distant period in the future, outside of moneyed circles, will have few friends. Educated as the mass of the people are in the belief that a public debt, like a private debt, is a curse, the one is abhorred as much as the other. The circulation debt, is a curse, the one is abnorred as much as the other. The circulation of the national banks is based upon the public debt. Without a public debt there would be no national-bank notes. To have the circulation of these banks equal to the currency wants of the people there must be more than an equal amount of public debt. If that part of the public debt bearing interest was now on deposit as the basis of circulation of the national banks, 90 per cent. of its amount would give but little more national banks, 80 per cent. of its amount would give but little more currency to the country than the amount we now have.

If the whole public debt, or a part less than the whole, is to be made permanent, and so kept, for the sole purpose of aiding the national banks to issue circulating notes, I am persuaded that a paper-money system less expensive would be more satisfactory to the people. The cost of maintaining a public debtamounting to several hundred million dollars for the mere use of the national banks would be little, if any, less than $25,000,000 a year. Such a tax for such a purpose I do not believe the people would cheerfully pay. The circulation of the national banks, I repeat, will contract in spite of all this bill may do. Their circulation in November last was $333,559,813. The bonds on

The amount of the 3 per cent. bonds outstanding in November last was $194,190,500. All but $38,486,100 are held by the national banks. The 3 per cent. bonds are payable at the pleasure of the Government. Every month their number grows less. Reduced taxation might temporarily check their redemption. But before this event is likely to occur all will be paid. At the end of two years it is more than probable that but few of the 3 per cent. bonds will be outstanding. This opinion is expressed by the Comptroller of the Currency in his last report, and is entertained generally by those who give attention to mone-tary affairs. It will be seen, therefore, that the 3 per cent. bonds are no longer available as a basis for national-bank circulation, and as these bonds are redeemed national-bank currency issued upon them must necessarily retire. Seven hundred and thirty-seven million six hundred and ninety-three thousand four hundred and fifty dollars of 4 per cent. bonds were outstanding in November, 1884. The national banks held near $117,000,000.

The estimated amount held by savings-banks and trust companies The estimated amount held by savings-banks and trust companies is near $300,000,000. Of the remainder, some are held by individuals as trust funds, some as permanent investments, and some are held on sale. Of those on sale, it is safe to say, the amount does not exceed $200,000,000, and equally safe is it to say of the others that but few could be bought by the national banks at a price they would be willing to pay. But whatever may be the amount of 4 per cent. bonds available as a basis for national-bank circulation, there is no reason for beliaving that the circulation of these banks will be increased by the pure believing that the circulation of these banks will be increased by the purchase of 4 per cent. bonds. Should the premium on the 4 percents remain where it is or advance still higher, the national banks, or some of them, will doubtless dispose of a part if not all they hold to realize the high premium, and this, to the extent it is done, will also con-

Of the 4½ per cent, bonds it is unnecessary to speak. are at a high premium, and this, as well as their early maturity, are reasons why they are unsatisfactory to deposit for circulation. To me it is plain that with the bonds we have the circulation of the national banks will contract to a point below that which is now maintained upon the 4 percents now upon deposit.

The fact that during the present year the corporate existence of seven hundred and twenty national banks will terminate is not to be overlooked in considering the question under discussion. The circulation of these banks is $107,484,115. Their bonds on deposit amount to $120,060,850. What proportion of this number will extend their corporate existence under the act of July, 1882, it is impossible to state. If circulation is no positive advantage upon bonds available as a deposit, it is not unreasonable to presume that one-fifth at least of the seven hundred and twenty will not renew their corporate life. From this cause, then, more or less of contraction must be expected.

With the 3 per cent. bonds out of the way, few of the 4 percents within reach, and some now on deposit sold, and 4½ percents undesirable, national-bank note circulation must stand ere long at less than $100,000,000, which is not equal to one-ninth part of the entire currency of the country.

In the absence of legislation, what is there to prevent the circulation of the national banks from contracting to a point where it will be unimportant in transacting the business of the country? So far as this bill authorizes the national banks to increase their circulation 10 per cent. upon the bonds they now have on deposit, it is a most tempting offer to those who own the stock in these banks. Such a large bonus in aid of a private interest is certainly unprecedented in legislation. If the offer should be taken, these bank owners will pocket what we give them and chuckle heartily at their good luck.

— Shall we do anything to increase the circulation of national banks or do nothing, and in this way allow it to contract and eventually retire? In better words, what can be done to make national-bank notes in the future, as in the past, a part of the currency of the country? As long as these institutions issue circulating notes so long must there be security pledged for their redemption. Anything except the bonds of the Government ought not to be thought of as a security for the payment Shall we make a bond for the sole use of the national of these notes. of these notes. Shall we make a bond for the sole use of the national banks? Unless this is done, I repeat, it is only a question of time when national-bank notes will be retired and their issue cease. How can this be done? The interest-bearing debt is $1,196,147,450 and the non-interest-bearing debt is $636,430,040. Of the interest-bearing debt the 3 and 4½ per cent. bonds might be refunded. These bonds appear to be the only part of the public debt which can be put at the service of the national banks. To refund these bonds the interest they will bear, for years and years, will add to the burden of the debt now borne by the

If we put the legal-tenders (greenbacks) into interest-bearing bonds, we lose them as currency, and to the extent of the interest they bear we make another debt for the people to pay. Do all that we can, and the best that we can, and it is uncertain whether or not national-bank currency can be preserved. Can a bond be made that will be acceptable to the national banks and acceptable also to the people? Along bond would not have general approval, and a short one would not be satisfactory to the banks.

If we are mindful of the people's interests we will make no bond which will rate in the money market above its par value. There per cent. bonds are at a premium. This is suggestive that a long bond, bearing a less rate of interest, would maintain its par value. As long as the credit of the Government stands at its present high mark, a 2½ if not a 2 per cent. bond will rate at par. If a new bond is to be made I insist 2 per cent. bond will rate at par. If a new bond is to be made I insist that it be made in the interests of the people rather than in the interests of the national banks. From the earnings of the people must come the money to meet the quarterly or semi-annual interest they will bear, and therefore the burden to be imposed ought to be made light. National bankers say they will have nothing to do with a bond bearing less than 3 per cent. interest.

In my judgment, the people will not consent to the issue of any other. This contention between opposing interests, it is suggested, may be adjusted by the repeal of the law imposing 1 per cent. tax upon the circulation of national banks. This proposition has few disinterested friends, and it ought not to be urged. If issuing circulating notes is an advantage to national banks, they should not be unwilling to pay for the privilege, especially when it is exclusive. State laws, it is believed, do not tax the circulation of national banks. If this be true, the 1 per cent. tax is all the tax that this species of property pays. The bonds upon which circulation issues are, as we all know, exempt from taxation. To this exemption there is an unwilling submission. Against the further exemption of capital from taxation the people will Against the further exemption of capital from taxation the people will justly cry aloud.

If it be true, as national banks claim, that their profits from circulation are small, no harm will come to these institutions if all their circulating notes are retired. As banks of discount and deposit they would be useful to the public and profitable to their owners. The banks of discount and deposit regulated by State laws would be their competitors in business, and between the two systems the impartial judgment of the people would make choice.

But if national-bank notes are retired, what shall be the currency in its stead?

Our currency, at this time, consists of-

Legal-tenders (greenbacks)	$346, 739, 256
National-bank notes	333, 559, 813
Gold and silver certificates	257, 799, 441

The notes of the national banks, it will be seen, constitute a little more than one-third of the currency of the country. If for national-bank note currency another can be substituted equally good, equally safe, and equally satisfactory to the people, the loss of national-bank notes soon would be forgotten.

The question as to what shall constitute our money and our currency seems to be a difficult one to settle. We have four kinds of money and four kinds of currency. Of the metals there is gold, silver, copper, and nickel. Of paper we have legal-tenders (greenbacks), national-bank notes, gold certificates, and silver certificates. Whether iron or lead, or both, will be added to the list of metals, or more paper issues, differing in kind, are yet to come—who knows? Four kinds of paper money, in kind, are yet to come—who knows? Four kinds of paper money, each unlike the other but all issued by the same authority, and circulating upon the same credit, may and possibly do show great financial wisdom, yet to the average mind it is beyond comprehension.

A thorough adept in matters of finance understands well why four printing presses, operated side by side in the same room, or in different rooms under the same roof, or in contiguous buildings, it may be, yet all under one superintendence, with the aid of paper and ink and the engraver's art, should make four kinds of paper money; but one unskilled in that science will have no other notion than it would be far better if it was one kind instead of four. But the money-changers understand the advantages of four kinds of paper money, if other people do not. The currency of this age will be a wonder to the people in the age that is before us.

What the country needs is a permanent solution of the currency question. It seems to baffle the financial genius of our times. Its ultimate solution rests with the financial genius of the future. who shall unify it and make it for the people and of the people will have a name in the statute-book of our country more enduring than if chiseled in marble or brass. If we are unable to originate a currency uniform and permanent, we should legislate wisely respecting the makeshifts that we have.

If gold and silver certificates, either or both, were to be stricken from our currency list, the gold and silver interests would be in instant commotion. Retire the greenbacks and issue national-bank notes in their stead, and the moneyed interests in every part of our country would be But retire the national-bank notes and in their place put the legal-tender issues of the Government, and we may well expect that for thirty days at least every national bank in the land would be draped in mourning. Every movement made in the interests of the people upon the subject of the currency appears to be antagonized by some selfish interest. If my judgment is not at fault, national-bank note circulation will be retired unless Congress comes to the rescue by legislating still further in the interests of the national banks and against the interests of the people. I am no advocate of what is called green-back doctrines. I still hold the hard-money faith, in which the Democratic fathers lived and died.

I would not pay off the public debt with the legal-tender issues of the Government; neither would I put affoat an undue amount of paper money, or any amount irredeemable. But if national-bank notes are to be retired from necessity or choice, their place must be filled. If this place can be filled with anything better than the legal-tender notes of the Government, say what it is, and my vote shall be for it. legal-tender currency is the best we have, and the best we are able to make, it is the currency that should come when national-bank notes

For many years the circulation of Government notes has been larger than the circulation of national-bank notes. It would, therefore, be no experiment to issue more of the former and less of the latter. Until the Supreme Court of the United States said Government notes are legaltenders they were supposed to be no better, and by many not as good as national-bank notes. Had the law authorizing the issue of the green-back given it credit instead of discredit, the public debt at the close of the war would have been more like a mole-hill and less like a mountain in size.

As long as Government notes were not legal-tenders objections to their issue were not without reason. Now that they are legal-tenders, unquestionably they are the best paper-money we have. Until something better is suggested, I would have legal-tenders take the place which national-bank notes seem destined to vacate. Issue legal-tenders in lieu of 3 per cent. bonds, which are payable at the pleasure of the Government and amount to $194,190,500. Do this at once. This will stop the contraction now going on in national-bank note currency. Issue legal-tenders and with them pay the 3 per cent. bonds and near $6,000,000 a year will be saved to the people. The substitution of legal-tenders for the 3 per cent. bonds would retire all national-bank note circulation based on the 3 per cent. bonds, which amounts to about $140,000,000.

The circulation based upon the 4½ per cent. bonds must be about $44,000,000. When these bonds ($250,000,000) mature, six years hence, or sooner if it can be done to advantage, substitute legal-tenders, if not or sooner if it can be done to advantage, substitute legal-tenders, if not for all, then for such portion as the currency interests of the country may then require. Here again would be saved to the people $11,250,000 a year, which they now pay for interest on these 4½ per cent. bonds.

As long as silver certificates issue at the rate of $2,000,000 a month

no harm can come to the business interests of the country if the na-tional-bank-note circulation contracts as the friends of this bill say that it will. It is a fact well enough to bear in mind that while national-bank note currency is $24,170,676 less now than one year ago, silver certificates exceeding this amount were issued in the same year. So that as national-bank notes are being retired their place is filled with silver certificates. This is one way in which we may legislate to reduce taxation, and that, too, without disturbing in the least the business interests of the country.

These suggestions may be unwise. They are, however, the matured thoughts of many who would have the money affairs of the people managed with the same judgment that they manage with eminent success their own business interests.

We have heard read from the Clerk's desk letters from several gentlemen who are at the head of some of the largest national banks in New York. These gentlemen tell us that this bill ought to pass. Their opinions are influenced no doubt to some extent by self-interest. What they say may, and possibly does, reflect the opinion of all who own national-bank stock. It reflects none other. Against these interested opinions are the interests of many millions of people who have no connection with these moneyed institutions. The question is one of in-dividual gain on the one hand and the public good on the other. Be-tween these opposing interests I take my stand on the side of the people. Whatever the national banks or their friends may say against the policy that is suggested, they can not say that if pursued it will not save to the people $17,000,000 interest-money each year. They can not say that it will not give to the people a better currency than national-bank notes, a currency as good and as lasting as the Government

Mr. Speaker, what I have said has been spoken in no spirit of unfriendliness to national banks or to the many honorable gentlemen connected with these institutions. With the stockholders and officers in many of them, in my own State, I have a personal acquaintance. It gives me pleasure to state that, without an exception, they are men of integrity and stand high in public esteem. Having no interest in banks, and in no way connected with them except when doing business at their counters, I can speak freely and disinterestedly about that which affects their interests upon the one hand and the interests of the people upon the other. What the 100,000 owners of national banks ask for in the rending bill is in my independ antegonized by the interests of the pending bill is, in my judgment, antagonized by the interests of more than 50,000,000 of people. To favor such a measure I would be untrue to my own convictions and untrue to what I believe to be the convictions of those whose suffrages give me a voice and a vote in making laws for the American people.

French Spoliation Claims.

SPEECH

HON. WILLIAM E. ROBINSON,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 14, 1885,

On the bill (S. 1820) to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York, said: Mr. SPEAKEE: If age deserves respect, these claims must be considered highly respectable. They are venerable in years and sanctified in national gratitude. They were contracted over the cradle of the Republic and ratified at its baptism. They are rooted in the memories of Valley Forge and fragrant with the glories of Monmouth and York-

By the treaty of the 6th of February, 1778, we stipulated with France to give certain privileges to her ships and merchandise and to aid in protecting her in her possessions. Gladly did we make these stipulations, for Washington was sorely pressed, and the shadow of death seemed to have settled on our hopes of independence as the Father of his Country gathered his suffering children around him with scant food and shelter amid the gloom of Valley Forge. That gloom was dispelled by that treaty. A bright morning dawned upon the darkest night that ever brooded over patriotic hopes. The thunder of Knox's artillery and the gleam of Wayne's bayonets under Washington, aided by France, at Monmouth and Yorktown speedily secured our indeby France, at Monmouth and Yorktown speedily secured our inde-

Pity it was that two such friendly powers should so soon come to distrust and injure each other. Jay's treaty with Great Britain, so acceptable to those who had not been weaned from their love of England, gave great offense to France and her friends on this side of the water. She thought that we should go with her against the world in the wild leap which she took for liberty after us, but the promises which seemed so reasonable to us in the gloom of Valley Forge were not deemed so desirable in the light of our independence. We failed to come up to her expectations in our support of her cause against her and our ancient enemy, and our statesmen sought wisely, perhaps, if not in accordance with our treaties, to "avoid entangling alliances." Her navy committed outrages upon the shipping and commerce of our merchants. The national convention of France decreed May 9, 1793, that "French ships of war and privateers may arrest and bring into the ports of the republic the neutral vessels which shall be laden, wholly or in part, either with articles of provisions belonging to neutral nations and destined to an enemy's port, or with merchandise belonging to an enemy," but by a subsequent decree declared "that the vessels of the United States are not comprehended in the dispositions of the decree of the 9th of May." These and other decrees and proceedings under them were considered by our Government as in direct violation of the law of nations and of the treaties France had made with us, and Congress, by act of July 7, 1798, annulled these treaties. The right of our citizens to have compensation from France for these depredations was considered so clearly established that our Government in its instructions to our envoys to France, under date of October 22, 1799, declares:

First. At the opening of the negotiation you will inform the French ministers that the United States expect from France, as an indispensable condition of the treaty, a stipulation to make to the citizens of the United States full compensation for all losses and damages which they shall have sustained by reason of irregular or illegal captures, or condemnation of their vessels and their property, under color of authority or commissions from the French Republic or its agents.

The executive Directory of France also declared again and again that their cruisers had committed unjustifiable depredations upon our merchants; but France claimed compensation for our non-fulfillment of the treaties with her, and that, if compensation for our non-tainfinite the treaties with her, and that, if compensation were made, it should be mutual. We, in our extremity at Valley Forge, had stipulated that we should guarantee to France her present and future possessions in America, and that her privateers and prizes should enter our ports and depart at pleasure, while the privateers and prizes of the enemics of France were to be excluded. These and other stipulations in our treaty with France were of vast importance to her. She was at war with England, which had great interests in the West Indies. France, by having our ports as places of refuge, could easily annoy and injure England in her commerce in the West Indies. But our Government determined to maintain a strict neutrality and refused to France the advantages which our treaties with her gave her, and she very reasonably complained and claimed damages. Our ministers acknowledged the justice of her claims by offering terms for the modification of the treaties.

After long negotiations, serious complications, and much diplomacy a settlement was effected by the treaty of September 30, 1800, and its subsequent modifications, by which we were discharged forever from the onerous burdens of our treaties, made in the hour of need, and from all claim of indemnity for refusing to France the privilege they secured to her; and for these great advantages we paid France by offsetting against her demands the claims which our citizens kad against her and for which we thereby became as clearly liable to our own citizens as if we had borrowed from them the money which France claimed we owed her for wrongs which we inflicted on her. Could any one, either in France or in the United States, have ever imagined that a government controlled by any sense of justice could so long delay the payment of so just a claim as this, and after eighty-four years of unjustifiable procrastination still persist in inflicting such injustice upon its own long-suf-

Soon after the making of this treaty numerous petitions were presented to Congress by merchants who had suffered by these spoliations. The first, I think, was presented by Mr. Samuel Smith, of Maryland, who was a brigadier-general in the Revolutionary war, and was afterward for many years a Representative and Senator in Congress. On the 5th of February, 1802, a committee was appointed by the House to consider these claims, and on the 15th day of March in that year Mr. Roger Griswold, of Connecticut, brought the subject before the House by the following resolution:

Resolved. That it is proper to make provision by law toward indemnifying the merchants of the United States for losses sustained by them from French spoliations, the claims for which losses have been renounced by the final ratification of the convention with France as published by proclamation of the President of the United States.

This was in the Seventh Congress, in which sixteen States and no Territory were represented, and this resolution was introduced in the House of Representatives, which then seemed to have more distinguished men than were in the Senate. Roger Griswold, Edward Livingston, Samuel L. Mitchell, Andrew Gregg, James A. Bayard, Samuel Smith, John Randolph, Nathaniel Mason, Thomas Lowndes, and John Rutledge were members. It was the first Congress held in the administration of Jefferson, and it was to this Congress that Mr. Jefferson delivered his message in writing sent by messenger. The former method was to have the two Houses listen to an address in person, and going in form to present their answer which Jefferson considered too. This was in the Seventh Congress, in which sixteen States and no going in form to present their answer, which Jefferson considered too close an imitation of the royal mode of opening the British Parliament.

On introducing the resolution Mr. Griswold, Mr. Smith, Mr. Lowndes, Mr. Mitchell, Mr. Gregg, Mr. Bayard, and Mr. Rutledge spoke, and the House refused to consider the resolution by a vote of 33 to 54. On the 22d of April, 1802, the committee which had been appointed in February made a valuable historical report, which did not conclude with any recommendation of a mode of relief or even of investigation.

On the 24th of January, 1803, Mr. Mitchell, of New York, moved for the appointment of a committee by the following resolution:

Resolved. That a committee be appointed to inquire by what means the value or amount of property taken from citizens of the United States by the French during the late war in Europe can be best ascertained, and the several sorts of captures distinguished and classed, and report their opinion thereon to this House, to the end that indemnification may be made.

Near the close of the last session of the Seventh Congress Mr. Bayard brought the subject again before the House, and again the House refused to consider it, by a vote of 21 to 48. Among those voting for it were Messrs. Bayard, Griswold, and Mitchell. Among those voting in the negative was John Randolph. This delay or refusal to take up the subject was not the fault of the claimants, who kept pressing their claims, but of Congress, which refused even to inquire into the matter. The distinguished speakers in this debate have long since passed away. Samuel Smith continued in Congress over thirty years after this debate, and died at the age of 87 without seeing any progress made in settling these claims, on which he had presented the first petition to Congress. James A. Bayard, born in Pennsylvania, and dying seventy years ago in Delaware, where he had founded an illustrious family, left to his grandson, the present distinguished Senator from Delaware, the advocacy of the cause which he so eloquently sustained a quarter of a century before this grandson was born. Andrew Gregg was, ten years after this debate, still serving the State of Pennsylvania in the Senate of the United States, and as President pro tempore of that body. He removed in 1814 from his farm in the wilderness to Bellefonte.

Mr. Gregg was a fine specimen of the Irish element in the United States, of splendid bodily physique, large brain, and handsome face. It was from that race that these States inherited their fame for manly men and beautiful women. It was from this element that Pennsylvania obtained her long and illustrious race of heroes, statesmen, and scholars. Well, at Mr. Gregg's hospitable mansion at Bellefonte he welcomed a young Irish gentleman, handsome and highly educated and conversant with the classics and modern languages. To this accomplished gentleman Mr. Gregg gave his charming daughter in marriage, and in 1817 they presented him with a grandson inheriting the virtues of his race, and they named him, after his grandfather, ANDREW GREGG CURTIN. This child grew up from fair youth to bright manhood, and some forty years ago brought his beautiful bride to New Haven, in Connecticut. A handsomer couple never sat down to the famous table of the Tontine Hotel, beneath the shade of its overarching elms. It was there and then that I formed a most pleasing acquaintance with that young bridegroom who, after distinguished honors, borne with dignity at home and abroad, is now the distinguished chairman of the committee [on Foreign Affairs] which has introduced this subject into this House for our consideration to-day, and is blessed with a family of children and half a score of grandchildren worthy of their honored progenitors, and who is now speaking in the cause which engaged his grand-father's attention eighty-two years ago, and fifteen years before this grandson was born.

I have wandered into this digression, for which I hope my old-time friend will forgive me in referring so familiarly to himself and family, to show what delays these claims have encountered. Fifteen years before he was born his father-in-law was a leading figure in the discussion of these claims, and his grandchildren are witnesses of the debates on the same subject on which his grandfather and their great-grand-father spoke so many years ago. Had Charles Dickens taken the case of the French spoliation claims, in place of the chancery case of Jarn-dyce and Jarndyce in his Bleak House, what a far better picture he could have drawn of interminable delays. The case of which he speaks could have drawn of interminable delays. commenced twenty years ago, in which from thirty to forty counsel had been engaged at one time, in which costs had been incurred to the amount of £70,000," was nothing to this spoliation claim, "although it had its worn-out lunatics in every mad-house and its dead in every church-yard; its ruined suitor with his slipshod heels and threadbare dress begging and borrowing through the round of every man's acquaintance, which gives to moneyed might the means abundantly of wearing out the right, which so exhausts finances, patience, courage, hope, so overthrows the brain and breaks the heart."

In his opening chapter of Bleak House you have the following vivid description of this matter if you only substitute "French spoliation claims" for "Jarndyce and Jarndyce:"

claims? for "Jarndyce and Jarndyce:"

Jarndyce and Jarndyce drones on. This searcerow of a suit has, in course of time, become so complicated that no man alive knows what it means. The parties to it understand it least; but it has been observed that no two chancery lawyers can talk about it for five minutes without coming to a total disagreement as to all premises. Innumerable children have been born into the cause; innumerable young people have married into it; innumerable old people have died out of it. Scores of persons have deliriously found themselves made parties in Jarndyce and Jarndyce without knowing how or why; whole families have inherited legendary hatred with the suit. The little plaintiff or defendant, who was promised a new rocking-horse when Jarndyce and Jarndyce should be settled, has grown up, possessed himself of a real horse, and trotted away into the other world. Fair wards of court have faded into mothers and grandmothers; a long procession of chancellors has come in and gone out; the legion of bills in the suit have been transformed into mere bills of mortality. There are not three Jarndyces left upon the earth, perhaps, since old Tom Jarndyce, in despair, blew his brains out at a coffee-house in Chancery-lane; but Jarndyce and Jarndyce still drags its weary length before the court, perennially hopeless.

Thirty years after the first attempt to have these claims attended to, and fifty-two years ago, the question was again brought before Congress. Andrew Jackson was President, and Vice-President Martin Van Buren presided over the Senate. Daniel Webster, Silas Wright, Theodore Frelinghuysen, Samuel L. Southard, John M. Clayton, John Tyler, John C. Calhoun, William C. Preston, John Forsyth, Henry Clay, Hugh L. White, Thomas Ewing, and Thomas H. Benton were all members

L. White, Thomas Ewing, and Thomas H. Benton were all members of the Senate. When shall we see such a galaxy again?

In the House were George Evans, Franklin Pierce, Rufus Choate, John Quincy Adams, Edward Everett, John Davis, Tristam Burges, Churchill C. Cambrelling, Dudley Selden, Aaron Ward (father-in-law of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania), Samuel Beardsley, Millard Fillmore, Horace Binney, John Y. Mason, Henry A. Wise, George McDuffie, James M. Wayne, Richard H. Wilde (statesman, orator, and poet), Richard M. Johnson, John Bell, James K. Polk, David Crockett, Bailie Peyton, William Allen, Thomas Corwin, and Edward A. Hannegan. From such a Congress one would naturally expect hon-A. Hannegan. From such a Congress one would naturally expect honorable legislation.

On the 11th day of December, 1832, a bill to provide for the satisfaction of these claims was introduced in the Senate, and it was referred to a committee of five, of which Mr. Webster was chairman. On the 14th of January, 1833, Mr. Webster spoke upon it for two hours. It then went over till December 17, 1833, when Mr. Webster again spoke in its favor. He was followed by John Tyler, of Virginia, in opposition. Mr. Shepley, of Maine, spoke in its favor, giving a graphic history of the claims. Silas Wright, of New York, followed against the bill. Mr. Benton, of Missouri, also opposed the bill, declaring that "this bill, if passed, would be the most odious and unprincipled ever passed by Congress." Mr. Webster replied to Mr. Benton; John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, spoke against it, and was answered by Mr. Clay and Mr. Webcarolina, spoke against it, and was answered by Mr. Clay and Mr. Webster. Mr. Bibb, of Kentucky, a quaint old gentleman with a cue and knee-breeches, and who was afterward Secretary of the Treasury in President Tyler's Cabinet, spoke in opposition, and on the 28th of January, 1835, the bill (appropriating $5,000,000) passed in the Senate—yeas 25, nays 21. Among the yeas were John Bell, James Buchanan, Henry Clay, John M. Clayton, Theodore Frelinghuysen, William C. Preston, Samuel L. Southard, and Daniel Webster. Among the nays were Messrs Benton Calboun and Wright. were Messrs. Benton, Calhoun, and Wright.

The bill, however, was not reached in the House, and so failed to become a law

Those who took part in this discussion have long since passed away. Webster and Wright, Clay and Calhoun, Benton and Bibb, all died over a quarter of a century ago, but still the French spoliation claims survive-Jarndyce and Jarndyce still drones on.

It is now forty-one years since I came to Washington to attend to the affairs of Congress. I then found the French spoliation claims a venerable but vigorous question in these Halls. Widows and orphans, who were born after their fathers had grown gray in the pursuit of these phantom claims, were prominent here at the hotels, or flitting between the two Houses and gazing from the galleries, and some of them shone at the White House and other receptions. The face of one of these is at the White House and other receptions. The face of one of these is still as distinct before me as a photograph, though her name is forgotten. She was a beautiful young woman, with great wealth of hair and charm of face and figure, with a dash in her veins of blood of the Paul Jones family. She devoted herself to the work of popularizing these claims. She lived at the National Hotel, then known as Coleman's, and previously as Gadsby's. Willard's was then known as Fuller's Tavern, and was a popular resort for judges of good liquor. She was acquainted with all the leading Senators and Representatives, and had the enthusiastic support of Edward A. Hannegan, of Indiana, transferred from the House to the Senate, and noted for his impulsive Western oratory. She saw her homes almost realized. She saw a bill for ern oratory. She saw her hopes almost realized. She saw a bill for the payment of these claims passed both Houses but ruthlessly vetoed by President Polk. Her hair fell out, and its wealth of auburn turned by Fresident Folk. Her hair fell out, and its wealth of auturn turned to scattered silver. The roses withered from her cheeks, and her eyes grew dim through tears of disappointment, and finally she found rest in death, in a grave as dark as that in which her hopes for relief from Congress were buried. To whom she assigned her claims, or whether she sold them below their value, I know not, but I suppose her heirs or assigns have their longing eyes fixed upon this Capitol with a faith as firm as her own in her youthful days.

It is just forty years ago since James K. Polk was inaugurated President of the United States. At the head of his Cabinet was James Buchanan, who had eleven years before voted in favor of paying these bills. Robert J. Walker, William L. Marcy, and George Bancroft were also in his Cabinet. His administration began with the Twenty-ninth Congress, and among the prominent measures urged upon the attention of that Congress were these French spoliation claims. Forty-three years had then passed since they were first introduced into Congress, and forty more have now vanished into the eternities leaving these claims to-day unsettled at the door of this House. In the Senate of that Congress Vice-President Dallas presided with venerable white hair, which when these claims first came before Congress fell in clustered ringlets on the shoulders of a beautiful boy under 10 years of age. Among the Senators were David L. Yulee, Reverdy Johnson, Daniel Webster, Lewis Cass, Thomas H. Benton, Thomas Corwin, Sam Houston, and John C. Calhoun; all dead but Mr. Yulee, who still survives with many honors in the social circles of this metropolis. Among the Representatives I can, through the mist of vanished years, recall the voice and features of William L. Yancey, Alexander H. Stephens, Robert Toombs, Stephen A. Douglas, Jefferson Davis, Robert C. Winthrop, and Andrew Johnson; of these half-dozen three are dead and three survive—two of the survivors mourning with unchanged hearts over the lost cause and the other lingering on the border of that bourne from which when once crossed there is no returning, and whose voice perhaps from its farther side we shall hear by proxy in this House in a

Well, a bill for the relief of these claimants passed both Houses during Wonday the 10th of August, 1846, the Twenty-ninth Congress, and on Monday the 10th of August, 1846, President Polk sent his message vetoing it to the Senate. It appropriated five millions for the satisfaction of these claims. Mr. John M. Clayton and Mr. Webster made some remarks on the veto. The latter protested against the veto "as being a new and alarming extension of executive authority, not justified, not countenanced; finding no precedent, no apology in any previous exercise of executive power under the Constitution." This was the last day of the last session of the Twenty-ninth Congress, and the bill for the relief of these claimants died with the veto.

In the Thirty-third Congress the bill was again introduced and passed both Houses, but it was again vetoed, by President Pierce, in 1855.

Sometimes Congress refused to consider the matter at all. Some sometimes Congress refused to consider the matter at all. Sometimes it passed one House and failed in the other. Sometimes it passed both Houses and failed by the interposition of the veto. Over forty times it has been examined by Congress and reports have been made upon it. Of these, thirty-eight were favorable and only two unfavorable. Clay and Clayton, Choate and Cushing, Bell and Everett, Sumner and Shepley, Frelinghuysen and Southard, Bayard and Buchanan, Preston and Ewing, all of them by speech or formal report advocating its passage, and here we are again to-day with the prayers of these petitioners begging that justice be no longer delayed. The Senate has ititioners begging that justice be no longer delayed. The Senate has already passed it. The President will not veto it. It is our duty this day and hour to pass it by a strong majority that justice may be triumphant and sickened hearts may be made glad, that hope shall be no longer deferred.

Power to Originate Appropriation Bills.

SPEECH

HON. CHARLES T. O'FERRALL,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 23, 1885,

On the following resolution offered by Mr. Hurd:

"Whereas certain bills appropriating money from the Treasury of the United States, originating in the Senate, have passed that body and have been sent to this House for its concurrence, which are now upon the Speaker's table, to wit, Senate bill No. 398, entitled 'A bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools,' and many others; and "Whereas it is asserted that these bills are in violation of the privilege of this House to exclusively originate bills for raising revenue: Therefore, "Be it resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be hereby directed to inquire into the power of the Senate to originate bills appropriating money from the Treasury of the United States, and report to this House at as early a day as practicable. And said committee shall have leave to report at any time."

Mr. O'FERRALL said:

Mr. O'FERRALL said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I must confess this resolution has taken me by surprise. The bill which it antagonizes has been pending in this House since the latter part of the last session of this Congress. Repeated efforts have been made to secure its consideration, which has been prevented by our rules, and now, as its friends begin to hope with confidence that it will not be postponed much longer, we are confronted by a motion which, if sustained, will almost surely work its defeat for this session. I take it that if the House refers this matter to the Judiciary Committee it will defer action on this bill until a report has been made Committee it will defer action on this bill until a report has been made by that committee. Without in any manner intending to intimate that the consideration of the resolution by the committee will be unnecessarily delayed, we all know that it will be days at least before a report can be submitted. Then the many appropriation bills undisposed of will be pressing for consideration and crowding out this as well as other bills. I regret, therefore, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Hurd] has seen proper to submit this resolution at this time. It seems to me it would have been much better if the gentleman had waited until the bill to which his resolution particularly refers had been reached, when bill to which his resolution particularly refers had been reached, when full and ample time could be had for the discussion of the proposition embodied in his resolution.

But, sir, the resolution has been offered and this House must pass on it. What is it? What proposition does it contain? It contains a denial of the power of the other branch of Congress to pass the bill known as the educational bill. It denies the power of the Senate of the United States to originate a bill making an appropriation of money. The authority cited for this position is section 7, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States, which says:

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills.

Now, sir, to the common mind this section is plain and simple. Submit it to any plain, practical man, and he would be surprised to hear that any difference of opinion as to its construction or meaning could possibly exist. Take the words and analyze them in the light of their universal acceptation, and there is no mind at all acquainted with the English language that will not conclude that every word is unequivocal and not one has a compound meaning. But it is claimed by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio that the words "raising revenue" embrace the words "appropriating revenue;" that, as the power to originate bills for raising revenue rests exclusively in the House of Representatives, the power to originate appropriation bills also rests exclusively in this House

"expend," as "take in" and "let out," as "produce" and "consume." So that when the Constitution says that this branch of Congress alone shall have the power to originate bills to raise revenue, it meant by that to declare that this branch only could devise the means by which money was to flow into the Treasury for the support and maintenance of government, and to declare nothing more. But it is asserted by the distinguished gentleman that after money is raised, after it is collected from the people, it does not become "revenue" until it is appropriated, and that revenue is not "raised," in the meaning of the Constitution, until that revenue is not "raised," in the meaning of the constitution, that the money collected has been appropriated.

This is a proposition at variance with all my preconceived ideas as to the true, and proper, and generally accepted definition of the word "revenue." When I sought during the delivery of the gentleman's remarks to reconcile his definition of this very common word with my long understanding as to its meaning, I was confronted with this defi-nition given by Webster and every lexicographer I have ever examined:

Revenue, I. In a general sense, the annual rents, profits, interest, or issues of any species of property, real or personal, belonging to an individual or to the public. When used of individuals, it is equivalent to income. In modern usage, income is applied more generally to the rents and profits of individuals, and revenue to those of the state.

enue to those of the state.

2. The annual produce of taxes, excise, customs, duties, rents, &c., which a nation or state collects and receives into the treasury for public use.

This definition does not say produce and expend, receive and discharge, collect and disburse, take in and pay out, raise and appropriate, but it simply declares that revenue is the money that is produced, received, collected, taken in or raised by or from taxes, excise, customs, duties, &c. The moment it reaches the treasury that moment it becomes revenue. Every dollar of the large surplus now hoarded in the vaults of the National Treasury is revenue—money collected from the people—though it remains unappropriated.

I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that had it not been for the earnestness with which the proposition embraced in this resolution was presented, and the eloquence and adroitness with which it was supported, I would not have allowed it to occupy one moment of my time in its consider-

The school in which I have been taught has been that of a strict construction of the Constitution. I have been taught that the framers were careful in the selection of their language; that words were used in their ordinary meaning; that their purpose was to present a chart so plain that those who were to come after them could not misconstrue or misinterpret it.

It is true that with all their care questions of construction have arisen and the supreme judicial tribunal created by the Constitution has frequently been called upon to interpret its provisions. in the very infancy of this Union, as far back as the year 1800, the great political revolution which swept over this country placed this Government upon the bed-rock of strict construction, not only as to the rights reserved to the States, but as to the powers of the co-ordinate branches of the Government in their relations to each other. At times when passion has run high and calm judgment has been dethroned there have been departures from this fundamental principle. They have been justified by the emergencies and excused by the dangers of the hour.

Now no dangers confront us, unless it be the danger which the gen-tleman from Ohio predicted in what he regarded as an encroachment of the Senate upon the power given to this House. I have tried to show that there was no encroachment.

In opposing this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I am following closely in the line of my teachings. Strict construction and giving to every word its ordinary meaning, confining the General Government and each of its branches to the powers expressly conferred or arising by necessary implication, have been the lessons taught me in the political school in which I have been reared. I shall not depart from these principles, and hence shall not vote for a resolution which in my opinion embodies a proposition of such broad construction that the most advanced constitutional latitudinarian can adopt it with perfect pro-

But, referring to the danger which is thought by the gentleman from Ohio to threaten us if the power of the Senate to originate appropriation bills is recognized, I must say, with all deference, I think that all fears in that direction are not well-founded. The Senate of the United States is composed of gentlemen who in their love for the Constitution and regard for the interests of the people must be as sincere and ardent as the members of this House. They are citizens of the various States they represent, not foreigners. They represent no crowned head, no preferred classes, no dignitaries—they represent the States in their sovereign capacity.

I can see no danger in vesting in the Senate the power that is denied by the resolution. What matters it to this House whether they vote first or last on an appropriation bill if it is right? If a bill should come from the Senate that in the opinion of this body is wrong, why it can be throttled here. No appropriation bill can become a law except by and through the concurrence of this House. These are briefly my views, stated without any attempt at rhetoric.

Holding these views and looking with interest upon the fate of the Well, sir, it seems to me as clear as noonday that the terms "raise" bill at which this resolution in effect is aimed, I must express the and "appropriate" are as distinct in their meaning as "receive" and earnest hope that the friends of this important measure will find no constitutional obstacles in their way and will vote against this resolu-tion, and thereby save the educational bill from its inevitable doom in the event of the passage of this resolution.

I speak for Virginia when I say that there is no matter of legislation before this Congress in which her people take as deep an interest as in this bill, which is to lift from her shoulders the burden under which she has been suffering for the last fifteen years and enable her to throw wide open the doors of her school-houses for the full benefit of all her children, high and humble, rich and poor, white and colored.

Great have been her tribulations and intense have been her trials, but with a courage that has never been daunted, a zeal that has never flagged, and a determination that has never wavered she has continued to promote as far as her weakened ability would allow, year by year, her free common-school system. She is looking now with yearning eyes to this Congress for relief. Will it come? I wish I could give an affirmative answer, but I can not; I can only wait and hope. I shall regard the vote on this resolution as a strong indication of the disposition of this House upon this important subject, which is presented in four propositions:

First. Will the General Government aid in eradicating the great evil of illiteracy that is now resting so heavily upon certain States? Second. Will the General Government do its duty to those whom it clothed with the muniments of citizenship?

Third. Will the burden of educating 2,740,926 colored illiterates be permitted to rest upon eleven States with a white population of less than 8,000,000, while the other twenty-seven States and all the Territories, with a white population of 36,000,000, are burdened with the education of only 479,952 of this class?

Fourth. Must eleven States with an assessed wealth of only about $2,000,000,000 continue to have cast upon them the education of nearly seven-eighths of the colored illiteracy of this country, while the other twenty-seven States and all the Territories, with an assessed wealth of $15,000,000,000, shall escape with the education of only about oneseventh of this class?

Let this House ponder well these propositions, and let the gentlemen on this floor answer for themselves whether these are not wrongs that ought to be redressed. Let those of more favored States inquire within themselves whether it is just and right to continue this great inequality of burden. Let the spirit which the South has shown in regard to appropriations for the relief of those who have suffered by the misfortunes of war appeal in some degree for assistance in her behalf, and for the general welfare of the country. Let the dictates of right and justice and equity prevail, and Virginia and her suffering sister States will rejoice together over the passage of this bill and the great blessings that will flow from it.

Interstate Commerce.

SPEECH

HON. BYRON M. CUTCHEON,

OF MICHIGAN.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, December 16, 1884.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce, and to regulate such commerce—

Mr. CUTCHEON said:
Mr. SPEAKER: All laws and lawmakers exist, or should exist, for the greatest good of the greatest number.
When any law or lawmaker ceases to serve that end, the one should be repealed, the other retired. It is to this ultimate and crucial test that every act of proposed legislation ought to be brought, and if it will not bear this test it ought to be rejected.

If the hill under consideration will effect use the greatest good of the

If the bill under consideration will effectuate the greatest good of the greatest number, then it ought to become a law; if it will not, then it should not become law. If the Reagan bill will subserve the good—the substantial good—of a greater number than the so-called commission bill, then the former bill should have preference to the commission bill. Let us have the best bill and the best law, whatever its parentage. THE RAILROAD SYSTEM.

The railroad system of the United States is but fifty years old. It presents to us the most wonderful spectacle of rapid development and progress that the world has ever seen. In fifty years it has grown from nothing to 121,000 miles of road equipped and in full operation. It has become not only the highway of our commerce; it has become as well the chief vehicle of our civilization. This vast system has grown up in these few years under the imperious guidance of a natural law, which it can neither control nor override—the law of demand and sup-

The vast commerce which is carried by this railroad system flows in channels shaped by a law of nature as truly as the rivers that run to the sea, even though it may flow over mountain ranges, across apparently impassable gulfs, or great rivers; it flows from the springs of production to the great sea of consumption with an unerring course.

FRICTION INEVITABLE.

It was to be expected, nay, it was inevitable, that in the creation, organization, and operation of such a vast system inequalities, and perhaps abuses, would creep in. Like any machine just put in operation, there will be friction. It is our work to make that friction the least possible; and yet we shall need care and wisdom, lest in handling this system which has grown up under natural law we do not act against the law, disarrange the working of the whole, and do more harm than good.

In the course of this debate there have been, it seems to me, many unwarrantable assumptions, much ill-considered reasoning, and some ulterances savoring more of prejudice than of logic. It seems to have been assumed, in some quarters, that not to be hostile to railroads is to be an enemy of the people; and, vice versa, that every friend of the people must, prima facie, be an enemy of corporations.

CORPORATIONS

There are men who seem to shudder at the very name "corporation," and a chill goes over them as it does over a child when it hears of "ghosts" and "spooks." And yet without railroads the settlement and com-mercial development of the great interior regions and spaces of our country would have been impossible. Without corporations railroads would have been impossible. The enterprises are too vast, the amount of capital required too great, the combinations too extensive and complicated for individual management.

Ten, twenty, fifty, or a hundred upright and enterprising men, not one of whom has ever been accused in his community of being dishonone of whom has ever been accused in his community of being dishon-orable, associate themselves together under the forms of law for the promotion of a common and beneficent enterprise. They become at once an "artificial person," a "soulless corporation." Their enter-prise becomes "grasping greed." Their wealth becomes "bloated," and they themselves altogether the "enemies of the people!" The simple fact is that railroads can only succeed by serving the people. They can only succeed largely by serving the people well. A weak and sickly railroad is as impotent to serve the people as it is to pay its stock-bolders. holders

A railroad corporation, in order to do good service in bringing the producers and consumers of the country together, must be strong. It must have good road-bed, good track, good rolling-stock, good motive power. It must be capable of carrying much freight expeditiously and many passengers safely. A good railroad must be a strong one. The province of the legislator here is to see that their strength is not abused and that it is used for the greatest good of the greatest number.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION

The first question, which has been rather hinted at than raised, is, Has Congress the constitutional power to pass this bill or any such bill? In this case the grant is claimed to be express and to be contained in the words "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the several States." But this is not a bill to regulate the commerce so much as to regulate the carrier. Commerce is something broader and greater than carrying. Carrying is simply a means to commerce. So, while this may be a regulation affecting commerce it is commerce. while this may be a regulation affecting commerce it is something less than a regulation of the commerce itself. Of course the framers of the Constitution did not have the idea of railroads in their minds, for they were not yet conceived, at least not realized.

What was the evil to be remedied by this grant of power under the Constitution? It is easily gathered from the history of those times. Under the Confederation the several States had assumed to regulate trade between themselves and their adjacent States and to impose duties upon imports. On the other hand, the Confederation had no power to regulate commerce between the several States nor to raise revenue from imposts. Connecticut discriminated against New York and New York against Connecticut. The same was true of New Jersey and of other States

It was this very evil of the want of power in the Confederation to regulate commerce between the several States, and thus to raise a Federal revenue, that led to the meeting of commissioners of Virginia and Maryland at Annapolis, which finally developed into the constitutional convention at Philadelphia, and eventuated in our present Federal Constitution.

Constitution.

I think that no one can read the history of those times without being satisfied that the framers of the Constitution had in mind when they granted to Congress the power "to regulate commerce between the several States" a very different thing from the regulation of common carriers, which is all that this bill amounts to. But it may be said the greater includes the less. The power to regulate the commerce includes the power to regulate the carrier. Let it be granted.

We have at last struck a subject where we are all agreed that the Constitution is safe from infraction. Even our friends, the strict con-Constitution is safe from intraction. Even our friends, the strict constructionists, under the lead of that distinguished philoconstitutionalist, the gentleman from Texas, are able to put their fingers "into the very print of the nails," and upon the very words of the text and say, "Behold, here is the letter of the grant." The liberal constructionist is also content, knowing that no such mighty framework of government as this could exist and carry out its grand purposes without such a power to regulate commerce between its constituent Commonwealths, and are satisfied also that the right to exist as a nation implies the exercise of all needful power to effectuate the ends of its So we are all agreed that we have the needed power to pass either of these bills.

DIRECTED AGAINST RAILBOADS.

Railroads are the chief tools of commerce. Under our present sys tem of civilization they are the great instruments of distribution of all that the world uses, produces, or consumes. They are simply the means of bringing the producer and the consumer together. They bring the farmers of Dakota, Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Illinois into contact with the lumbermen and miners of Michigan, the coal and iron workers of Pennsylvania, the merchants and manufacturers of New York, and the operatives in the mills and factories of New England; and, vice versa, they bring the products of the mills and manufactories of New England and New York, the mines and furnaces of Pennsylvania and Ohio, and the lumber and iron of Michigan and Wisconsin to the doors of their consumers in the iron of Michigan and Wisconsin to the doors of their consumers in the South, West, and Northwest.

Now, all true political economy, which ever has for its end the greatest good of the greatest number, demands that the producer and consumer be brought together with the least possible waste and loss in distribution or transportation of products. I believe we are all agreed upon that. In other words, "the greatest good of the greatest number" demands the cheapest possible transportation for the products of labor; the lowest possible freights in bringing "meat to the sower and bread to the eater"—and this especially for long distances, else the whole value of the product will be used in transportation, and nothing will be left to compensate the producer, and he, therefore, ceases to prowill be left to compensate the producer, and he, therefore, ceases to pro-

LONG HAULS AND SHORT HAULS.

Thus it is manifest that longest transportation must have cheapest rates-that the good alike of the producer and the consumer demands

And they are "the greatest number."

Mr. Speaker, the great through trunk-lines of railroad, against which the Reagan bill is directed, were not constructed with reference to the local traffic along their lines so much as with reference to the carrying of this great interstate commerce, the bringing together of the great East and the great West—the seaboard and the markets of Europe on the one hand, and the great granary of the world in the basin of the the one hand, and the great granary of the world in the basin of the Mississippi on the other.

It was not for "the local trade" that the Pennsylvania road scaled the cliffs of the Alleghanies, or that the Baltimore and Ohio climbed the Blue Ridge and crawled along the dizzy heights of the Cheat River gorge, or that the Central Pacific soared above the clouds of the Sierras or crowned the eternal buttresses of the Rockies.

Not for this the Southern Pacific spanned the unfathomed chasms of the Colorado and the arid wastes of New Mexico; and not for this the Northern Pacific leaped through 1,500 miles of wilderness to bind in fron bands the Pacific coast and the great chain of lakes so as to bring the commerce of the Orient to the doors of 56,000,000 of consumers. These grand highways of commerce and of migration are the connecting-link between vast masses, not only of our own populations, but they connect our entire national system of transportation with other nations and other continents. Their construction has been of untold value in the building up of local communities and the devel-opment of local trade. But they were not primarily built for the benopment of local trade. But they were not primarily built for the benefit of local trade. Local trade could not exist without them, and local trade owes everything, even its existence, to them. But we must seek and find "the greatest good of the greatest number" in protecting and promoting their through traffic. But we are met by the Reagan bill, which forbids discriminations, which bases rates largely upon one sole element or factor, and that is mileage.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it ought to be apparent upon its face how unwise a prohibition this would be. Is it not apparent that it would subordinate the good of great sections and vast Commonwealths to the welfare of comparatively petry communities?

wealths to the welfare of comparatively petty communities?

This question of "long haul" and "short haul" has been so thoroughly discussed in this debate that I need consume but little time upon it.

Is it not apparent that the element of length of haul is one of the least factors in the cost of transportation?

Some of the neglected factors may be briefly named as follows:

Cost of construction of road.

2. The grade, and consequent motive power required to move a given tonnage

3. The quantity to be handled and hauled.

- 4. The continuity of supply for hauling, whether permanent or transient
- 5. The distance to be hauled without handling, breaking bulk, or breaking train.

6. The terminal facilities for handling.
7. The value of the tonnage, whether it be coarse lumber or valua-

8. Competition with water ways or other great trunk-lines having greater facilities or shorter lines.

9. The development of new enterprises and new feeders to a road. All these, and more, Mr. Speaker, must be taken into account in determining what discriminations will be equitable, proper, and wise under varying circumstances. These circumstances and equities can not be determined by a blind and inexorable law. There must be back of the law the quick human intelligence, the sound judgment and varied knowledge of the living judge or commissioner, with a certain discretion in the application of principles upon which we are all substantially agreed. I am therefore for the commission bill.

Then, Mr. Speaker, if this iron prohibition goes into effect, without such intelligent direction, what will be the effect? Will it be to bring local freights, those which accommodate the few, down, or will it be to send through freights, those that serve the many, up? It seems to me that the effect will be the latter, and that more will be lost, in the loss of the many, than will be gained in the gain of the few. It will put more money into the hands and pockets of the railroads, and will leave less as the portion of labor and production. It will waste in mere distribution what ought to be saved to the producer and the consumer. It will make dearer bread and meat for the millions of the East, and it will make dearer tools, lumber, salt, and iron for the millions of the

The local shipper may have to pay more to his first great competing point, which, I believe, is only and simply just; but he gets his freight cheaper beyond the competing point, and saves enough upon his incoming freight and in the reduced price of all that he consumes to more than compensate him for this discrimination.

I have not considered this question at all from the standpoint of the interest of the railroad. That is a matter of only secondary consideration. The railroad belongs to the few, and we are considering the interests of the many

I am not "a railroad man" nor an "anti-railroad man." I never had a dollar invested in a railroad in my life. I never was employed by a railroad in my life. I have no interest in them except as they are the greatest factor in our new age of modern development. I see no prospect but that they must continue increasingly that greatest factor in all time to come. I want to see them made the useful servants and not the imperious masters of the people. I want to see them controlled for the greatest good of the greatest number.

And, Mr. Speaker, this matter of the proper subordination and regulation of railroad corporations and common carriers is one that is to a great extent solving itself in accordance with the universal law of supply and demand, of competition and division of profits.

This is remarkably exhibited in the tables prepared under the direction of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics in his report on the relation of the railroads to commerce, some of which I will here insert, showing not only how competition has reduced the price of carriage by rail, but also, in the second table, how the competition of the great trunk-lines of railroad has reduced the price of transportation by lake

REDUCTION IN THE COST OF TRANSPORTATION AND THE CONCURRENT INCREASE IN THE VOLUME OF TRAFFIC.

During the last fifteen years the cost of internal transportation in this country has been greatly reduced. At the same time the volume of traffic has rapidly increased. This is clearly illustrated by the following facts:

From the available data presented in this table it appears that the average annual freight charge on the trunk-lines mentioned fell from 2.453 cents per ton per mile in 1868 to 1.803 cents per mile in 1873, and further to 1.055 cents per ton per mile in 1883. This important reduction in the cost of internal transportation by rail has been the combined result of new economies, improved facilities, and competition in transportation and in trade. The rapidly increasing volume of traffic has also been one of the important elements in cheapening the actual cost of transportation by rail.

- The great reduction which has been made in transportation charges in the United States, in so far as relates to the agricultural interests of the Western and Northwestern States, is, however, more clearly illustrated by the following statement showing the average annual rates for the transportation of wheat from Chicago to New York from 1857 to 1884:

*Including Buffalo transfer charges and tolls

It was not until about the year 1888 that the managers of the trunk-lines regarded the transportation of grain from Chicago to the seaboard as a source of profitable traffic.

The reduction in the average rates of transportation by lake and canal from 24.54 cents per bushel in 1888 to 6.60 cents per bushel in 1884, in the rates by lake and rail from 29 cents per bushel in 1868 to 9.75 cents per bushel in 1884, and in the "all-rail" rates from 42.6 cents per bushel in 1868 to 13 cents during the year 1884, has been the direct result of the sharp competition which has prevailed between the competing railroads, and with the water line formed by the lakes, the Eric Canal, and the Hudson River. This fall of rates has greatly stimulated the development of the agricultural resources of our highly productive Western and Northwestern States, and has tended enormously to increase the wealth of those States.

Many Illustrations might be presented in order to show the great increase in the volume of traffic which, at the same time, has taken place. The following table is, however, sufficiently indicative of the whole subject, and in this connection must suffice:

The total tonnage transported by rail on these three roads increased from 10,476,857 tons in 1868 to 46,177,223 tons in 1883.

This clearly illustrates the enormous growth of the internal commerce of the United States by rail.

These tables abundantly illustrate and demonstrate how, without restrictive and crippling laws, other than the laws of trade and commerce, competition has brought down the cost of transportation, saving thou-sands of millions to the producers and consumers of the country, has stimulated and developed production and increased the volume of commerce and diffused activity and prosperity throughout the length and breadth of the land. This natural law is still operative, and this process is going on. These corporations are the creatures of the law, and we have the power to do with them as we will. We have the right to control them subject to the law of the greatest good of the greatest number.

But, Mr. Speaker, I suppose that even railroad corporations have some rights. I do not suppose that it is right to confiscate a railroad any more than it is to confiscate a farm, a shop, or a factory. They must take what the law gives them, or rather what it leaves them.

Transportation is a commodity the same as wheat or pork, or iron ransportation is a commonly the same law of supply and demand, which is the law of gravitation of the economic universe.

Let us not seek to overturn the natural laws of trade, nor to undo the irrepealable law of the advantage of position. Every such attempt will prove a disastrous failure—more disastrous to the people than to the corporations. Let us rather work with the law, guiding, restraining, and correcting, but not contravening—seeking to remedy the understand arrived as a serious production of the composition of the serious contravening—seeking to remedy the understand arrived as a serious contravening—seeking to remedy the understand arrived as a serious contravening—seeking to remedy the understand arrived as a serious contravening—seeking to remedy the understand arrived as a serious contravening—seeking to remedy the understand arrived arrived as a serious contravening—seeking to remedy the understand arrived arrived arrived as a serious contravening—seeking to remedy the understand arrived arri doubted evils of a new and rapidly changing civilization in a new and wonderfully developing country.

We have to-day as much railroad mileage as all the rest of the world combined. We also have the cheapest transportation and the best railroad service in the world, and, what is more, it is growing constantly better. The people are getting better and cheaper service every year. The people have no use for feeble and bankrupt railroads. Such roads render neither good nor cheap service.

There can be no real monopoly in railroad service in this country for any long time. With a great and rapidly increasing amount of capital constantly seeking investment, whenever one line becomes unduly profitable another will spring up by its side to share its business and divide its profits.

Mr. Speaker, the natural laws and forces of material development are moving in the right direction. We only need to work with these laws, and guide these forces, and we shall continue to see in the future, as in the past, the greatest good of the greatest number steadily and surely and inevitably evolved.

Holding this faith, I shall vote for the commission bill.

Repeal of Certain Internal Taxes.

SPEECH

HON. ABRAM S. HEWITT,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, January 5, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 5432) repealing certain internal-revenue taxes.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I have warmly advocated the freeing from taxation of alcohol used in the arts. I have no objection to the repeal of the taxes on spirits distilled from fruit, because the revenue from this source is small and difficult of collection. I would gladly favor the repeal of the taxes upon tobacco if the state of the revenue would permit, because tobacco is the one luxury of the workingman. But I can not cause tobacco is the one luxury of the workingman. But I can not vote for the bill proposed to be passed by my colleague [Mr. Hiscock], for the reason that the aggregate reduction in the revenue which it will cause will make it impossible to secure other reductions in taxation more important than those proposed by this measure. In other words, the passage of this bill will make it impossible to institute any comprehensive reform in the revenue system of the country.

Business is now stagnant and labor unemployed because we make our manufactured products artificially and unprecessarily dear by taxes.

our manufactured products artificially and unnecessarily dear by taxes on the raw materials used in the arts. We can get no relief from our on the raw materials used in the arts. We can get no rener from our troubles until we repeal the duties on raw materials. Such a repeal will enable us to produce goods more cheaply and sell them in the open markets of the world. Our labor will then find ready employment at good wages, because the money now exacted by taxes on raw materials will be added to the wages fund. Without a repeal of these duties our industry is hopelessly confined in a sepulcher from which there can be no resurrection, although there will be a judgment day for those who have caused the funeral.

Moreover, the passage of this measure will leave the incoming administration with an empty Treasury and compel it to increase the public debt. This branch of the subject has just been exhaustively treated by Mr. David A. Wells, whose statement I append to these remarks for the careful study of those who preach that the repeal of the internalrevenue duties is necessary, possible, and desirable. For one, I know that it is not a feasible solution of our troubles, and I will do nothing which will impede the only practicable remedy which is to be found in the early repeal of all duties on raw materials:

The only other national expenditures prospective for the fiscal year 1885-'86 not mbraced in the above exhibit are the "arrears" of pensions and the annual ontribution to the "sinking fund" for the reduction of the national debt. Of the former it ought to be safe to say that they should be fairly balanced and paid off by the surplus revenues that will accrue over and above all ordinary expenditures (as above enumerated) before any legislation materially reducing taxation could now be enacted and take effect. Of the latter the amount required by statute for the year 1885-86 is $48,571,861, a sum very nearly equivalent to the present requirement for interest on the debt.* Assuming the aggregate national revenue for the same year to be as estimated by the Treasury—namely; $330,000,000—then the surplus for the year would be $11,171,563, or, including the sinking fund, $59,748,000. Owing, however, to what has been termed the "clasticity" of our revenue, it is very probable that the surplus as thus figured may be increased to the extent of $10,000,000 to $15,000,000, and if national prosperity comes back such increase may be regarded as certain. But, on the other hand, if but a moiety of the appropriations recommended for gun-founderies, new armaments, river and harbor improvements, and Mexican war pensions be granted, there will be no increase, and, apart from the sinking fund, no surplus whatever. With these facts and estimates, the fiscal influence of the proposed Spanish and other treatics, and also of the scheme for repealing the remaining tobacco and other internal taxes can be readily appreciated.

If the Spanish treaty alone is ratified, the immediate loss to the existing revenues from imported sugars and tobacco, estimated by the Bureau of Statistics at $30,000,000, will more than exhaust any probable surplus for the next fiscal year over and above the sinking-fund requirements, and leave nothing available for other tax reductions. If the result of the Spanish treaty is to be followed, as is contemplated, by the negotiation of other treaties and the entire abolition of the present receipts from sugar imports, then the Government must materially reduce its current expenditures or impose new taxes.

If the remaining internal taxes on toba

If the Government enters into obligations with Spain, Mexico, and the Ha-waiian Islands not to levy import duties upon their several sugar products for a period of seven years, and so abandons an important source of revenue, and sub-sequent exigencies should necessitate any new and large measure of national expenditures, then, also, the creation and imposition of new taxes would be im-expenditures, then, also, the creation and imposition of new taxes would be imperative.

The answer to a question which may naturally suggest itself in connection with this subject. "Why and in what respect are the national revenues likely to be less in 1885-86 than in 1882-88?" is to be found mainly in the circumstances that there is a falling off in receipts of duties from imports through depression in business of about $15,000,000 per annum, and in the internal revenues, through a reduction in 1883 of the taxes on tobacco, of some $25,000,000. And this reduction of the surplus through a reduction of the tobacco taxes strikingly illustrates the inexpediency of attempting to reform our national fiscal system with a view of reviving a depressed and stagnant industry by legislative action in answer to the demands of special interests; for while the reduction of the tobacco tax has greatly impaired the fiscal strength of the Treasury, it has been of but little benefit to the consumer of tobacco; has not increased our export trade to the extent of a single dollar, or done anything toward cheapening the cost, and so enlarging the markets, of any of our other products of industry.

On the other hand, more than $100,000,000 of imports can be named which go direct from the custom-houses to our manufactories and are used in the work of domestic production, and on which imports the Government exacts a taxation of more than the amount ($250,000,000) abated from the national revenues by the reduction of the internal revenue on tobacco. But $25,000,000 is 10 per cent. on $250,000,000 domestic product—not one dollar's worth of which can be sold in the open market of the world in competition with like products of British or European industries, which are exempt from such taxation. And it is just this $250,000,000 of product which it is now most desirable to sell, and which fexempt from taxation could be sold, but which the markets of Cuba, Mexico, or the Sandwich Islands, singly or in the aggregate, have not the capacity to

HON. RANSOM W. DUNHAM.

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 20, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. DUNHAM said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: A system of general internal improvements for the benefit of our commerce long ago became the settled policy of the United States Government. No one now doubts the propriety, the necessity, and the benefits our people have reaped as a result of the millions that have been appropriated.

So long as the public money is judiciously expended, so long as our commerce gains an advantage, so long as the people and their material interests receive proper and due consideration, to just this extent should the Government continue such appropriations.

No improvement is more needed, none more worthy, none so necessary as the proposed connection of the great lakes with the Upper Mississippi River by the construction of the Hennepin Canal.

*By the act of 1862 "1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States" is "annually set apart as a sinking fund for the purchase or payment of the public debt." And by the act of July 14, 1870, there is annually chargeable on the receipts from duties on imports "a sum for the payment of the public debt equal to the interest on all bonds belonging to the sinking fund." The sinking fund, therefore, annually increases while the interest on the principal of the debt by the action of the sinking fund annually decreases.

In the interest of cheap transportation this canal is a necessity. In the interest of both the consumer and the producer this national work should be secured at once. In the interest of our foreign trade, our exports of American products, this improvement should not be delayed. It is so plainly to the advantage of our whole country that the Government can not afford to delay. The whole Northwest is directly and closely interested in its desire to push its productions to the markets of the world, and the people need this work to cheapen transportation for the necessaries of life. The financial interests of the United States desire this improvement, that our agricultural products may be furnished to Western Europe at such prices as will compete with our rivals in India, Australia, and Russia, and yet secure to our people a liberal recompense for their labor.

A short review of the agricultural situation may not be out of place A short review of the agricultural situation may not be out of place here. Thirty to thirty-five years ago the people of New England depended for their supply of wheat flour largely upon Western New York, and the Genesee Valley to them at that time was their idea of agricultural perfection. A few years later the manufacturers of flour began to turn their faces westward, and soon Ohio and Indiana commenced to furnish the raw material, and the small vessels then plying upon the great later because the place here the state of the place here. great lakes became the agencies of transportation, and Buffalo, Rochester, and adjoining cities kept their mills running through the labor of what was then called Western farmers.

Twenty-five years ago the great bulk of wheat sold in the Chicago market was raised within two hundred miles of that city. Not further back than ten years ago Western New York and Pennsylvania millers looked to Chicago for their supplies. Now the tide has changed, and materially so. The wheat arriving in Chicago travels a distance from the farms averaging three hundred and fifty to four hundred miles. The great State of Minnesota contains within its borders the grandest water power and the facet flowing milks in the world. water power and the finest flouring-mills in the world.

These facts demonstrate that the agricultural products of America have "gone West." Our census reports show that the tendency of Eastern cities and States works to an increase of manufacturing centers.

Millions of people live in our cities consuming rapidly of agricultural products—pressing and demanding a constant cheapening of prices.

The past year has been one of heavy production from farms. Other wheat-raising countries are trying to drive America from the wheat-consuming people of the world. Our Western farmers are to-day forced to sell their wheat at below the cost of raising, and this state of things can

We can not afford to lose our exportations of wheat and wheat flour; neither in the interest of our millions of consumers can we bring ruin upon our agriculturists by requiring them to sell their products below actual cost. If either of these disasters come upon us it must result in a serious disturbance of our financial affairs.

I now present a statement of our exports and imports of merchandise for each one of the past five years, ending with the 30th June, 1884. These figures do not include any stocks, bonds, gold, or silver, but only the value of merchandise, such as grain, provisions, cotton, &c., and the usual importations of foreign goods.

By this table it will be seen that our exports of merchandise for the past five years have been $626,773,717 in excess of our imports-a situation in our commercial affairs that all will admit to be greatly to our advantage. No one can fail to see that our financial prosperity as a nation and our happiness as a people rest largely on our being able to continue in so good a work as this.

Exports and imports of merchandise.

Years.	Exports.	Imports.

I now present a table showing the number of bushels of wheat and number of barrels of wheat flour exported from our country during the five years ending June 30, 1884:

Years.	Wheat.	Wheat flour.
1880	Bushels. 153, 252, 795 150, 565, 477 95, 271, 802 106, 385, 828 70, 349, 012	Barrels. 6, 011, 419 7, 945, 786 5, 915, 686 9, 205, 664 9, 152, 260

Converting the flour to wheat at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ bushels per barrel, and we have a grand total of 747,863,582 bushels of wheat as a part of our total exports of merchandise as given in the previous table.

I now present a table showing the value of the wheat and flour ex-

1880	$225, 879, 502 212, 745, 742 149, 304, 773 174, 703, 800

By this it appears that the value of our wheat and flour exports for the past five years was $888,800,191, so that had we been unable to export any wheat or flour our exports would have fallen below our imports $262,026,474, a state of affairs that would have been a serious blow to our commercial and financial interests.

The present cost of getting wheat from Saint Paul to Chicago is about 12 cents per bushel. The United States engineers estimate that with the construction of the Hennepin Canal and the enlargement of the present Illinois and Michigan Canal the rate of freight can be reduced to 6 cents per bushel.

The State of Minnesota and the Territory of Dakota raised in the year 1884, according to the Government report, over 63,000,000 bushels of wheat, of which nearly 50,000,000 goes out of their section for a market. On this alone the Hennepin Canal will bring about a great saving of freight. Divide this amount by half and we have figures that speak strongly for this improvement. Present rates of freight by thet speak strongly for this improvement. Present rates of freight by rail from points in Iowa west of Des Moines, also from Nebraska and Kansas to Chicago, vary from 14 to 22 cents per bushel on grain. Build the Hennepin Canal and a large reduction in rates must naturally ensue. The grain crops in the States and Territories tributary to this canal for the year 1884 aggregate over 800,000,000 bushels. While no such amount is shipped to market, still the influence of reduced cost of transportation bears in some proportion on the whole.

During the past summer grain that paid 12 to 15 cents per bushel to get to Chicago from points five hundred miles west was shipped by lakes and Erie Canal from Chicago to New York for 7 cents per bushel, a distance of nearly 1,500 miles.

Coal was carried by vessels from Buffalo and Erie to Chicago during the same season for 50 cents per ton, a distance of about 1,000 miles, while to go by railroad two hundred miles west of Chicago it costs $2

In April, 1884, before the lakes were open grain was taken by Grand Trunk Railroad from Chicago to Montreal, thence by water to Liverpool, for less than 10 cents per bushel; perhaps an unusually low rate, but during the summer 12 cents per bushel was not an uncommon rate.

If we look back twenty-five years we find shippers paying 50 cents per bushel freight on grain from Chicago to New York by all-water route. At that time a vessel carrying 25,000 bushels on the lakes was unusual, the majority averaging eighteen to twenty thousand capacity. Now a steam-barge carrying 40,000 bushels takes in tow two others of fifty to seventy-five thousand capacity each.

I mention these facts to show the tendency of freights, but it is safe to say that the minimum figure has been reached at which rates can go on the lakes and Erie Canal.

What we now ask is a plan that will reduce the rates from the farms of the West to the great lakes. Water navigation has always been the great regulator, and nothing has yet been developed that disputes this True, competing railroads often make low rates, but freproposition. quently a water way is within reach and not unlikely is the power

For the past year our Western farmers have been compelled to sell their grain, especially their wheat, below the cost of production. Wheat at 25 to 50 cents per bushel is an absolute loss to the producer? We can not go any lower. We can not stand even present prices. If our farmers, to compete with India, must sell low, then a reduction must come in transportation. When it is demonstrated beyond a doubt that the building of a canal seventy-four miles in length will save millions of dollars either to the producer or the consumer, then it does seem unreasonable that the Government should hesitate as to its duty.

Two things will surely follow if the present low prices of our agricultural products are to continue—farmers must of necessity stop raising, and as a natural result an end comes to our exports. Two other certainties follow, high prices to our own home consumers and a disarrangement of our exchanges. Our imports will be liable to exceed our exports. Lose our exportation of wheat, and gold must leave our bank-vaults and go to Europe to make good the balance of trade.

I have referred in my remarks more particularly to wheat, because this great staple of the Northwest will feel the beneficial effects that will result from the building of the Hennepin Canal in a much greater degree than any other article.

It has been stated that New York built the Erie Canal. True, but it was at a time when the practice of our Government was against internal improvements. New York has drawn in tolls from the farmers of the West many millions of dollars, and, having realized some $35,000,000 more than it cost, she has only done an act of tardy justice in making free her canal navigation.

It is claimed that Illinois should build the Hennepin Canal. This is not proper, first, because if built by the State it would not be free; second, because her interest is very small. The States south, north, and west have a much larger interest than has Illinois in this matter. Is it unreasonable to ask the United States to do this work, when Illinois alone pays millions more every year into the National Treasury than this entire improvement will cost?

The claim has also been made that Chicago can afford to do this work. To those who are familiar with the facts, this is easily disproved. Chicago gets nearly all the Northwestern and Western products now, and will continue to get them. The course of trade is her way to reach the great lakes. Her position at the head of the lakes is absolutely impregnable; the trade does and will come to her.

The benefits arising from the construction of this canal will be gathered in equal parts by the consumer and the producer. No proposition for use of national funds is before Congress to-day having the merit and the necessity equal to this enterprise. Consumers and producers demand this appropriation. The necessities of commerce require that the work should be finished promptly.

I hope the members of this House, inspired by the patriotic motive to do what is right for all sections of our common country, will grant this request, coming, as it surely does, from more than 20,000,000 of people.

Various boards of trade and commercial organizations throughout the country have given strong expression of their views favorable to this necessary improvement, and that Congress may be informed as to the opinions of business men I publish a portion of their resolutions as an appendix to my remarks. Legislators will do well to respect the wishes of men who have spent their lives in building up commerce and who, by their experience, have justly earned a high regard for their opinions.

A NATIONAL WORK OF GREAT IMPORTANCE.

Whereas this board is advised that a renewed effort is about to be made to direct the aftention of the Congress of the United States to the question of constructing a short line of canal, of capacity equal to that which may be obtained in the Mississippi River between Rock Island and Saint Paul, from a point at or near Rock Island to the Illinois River at Hermepin, thus opening direct water communication between the upper Mississippi River and the lakes via the present Illinois and Michigan Canal; and

Whereas this work is of a national character, and of great importance as a means of cheapening the cost of transporting the products of the Northwest to foreign countries, and especially to the principal points of consumption in our own country, not only on such commodities as might seek that line of transport, but also on the perhaps larger volume carried by rail, as it, if completed, would act as an efficient regulator of railway tariffs, throughout a vast area of the most productive agricultural territory in the United States, on the well-known principle that rates of freight by rail are controlled by the rates current on and the possibility of diversion to the cheaper water routes; and

Whereas the estimated expenditure necessary to place this line in successful operation, as shown by the surveys of competent engineers in the United States service, is quite small in comparison with the great benefits to be secured to both producers and consumers by its construction: Therefore,

Resolved by the Board of Trade of the City of Chicago, That Congress be respectfully but urgently petitioned to grant at its next session an appropriation for this object, which will be sufficient to commence and prosecute the work with a vigor which will insure its completion with the least possible delay.

Resolved, That this expression be communicated to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, with the request that it be laid before [Resolutions of the Buffalo Board of Trade, adopted December 10, 1881.

First. The Board of Trade in the city of Buffalo and State of New York most respectfully calls the attention of the Congress of the United States to the necessity for increased and cheaper facilities for transportation, for the following reasons: First, that the great extent of territory embraced within our limits, together with its rapidsettlement and increased trade, which is now crowding our railways and water channels, with a prospect in the near future of assuming much larger proportions, calls loudly for prompt action, to the end that the general welfare shall be respected.

Second. That this board of trade and the commerce it represents have a direct interest in all water routes from the port of New York city by the Eric Canal and the great lakes to the Mississippi River, for we believe it is the most feasible and economical solution of the transportation question from the Northwest to the Eastern seaboard.

Third, And as a means to that end we are not only in favor of the speedy construction of the proposed Hennepin Canal, which will connect Lake Michigan with the Mississippi River, but we invite the attention of Congress to its importance as a link in a great national thoroughfare, and as such entitled to consideration and support.

Fourth. That our representatives in Congress, in both Houses, will best reflect our wishes by securing at this session of Congress an appropriation to build said canal.

Fifth, That the secretary of this board be instructed to forward to our Senators and Representatives in Congress a copy of these resolutions.

THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT SHOULD UNDERTAKE TO BUILD THE HENNEPIN CANAL.

At a meeting of the board of managers of the New York Produce Exchange, held December 20, 1881, the following report of the committee on trade was submitted, and the recommendations contained therein were unanimously adopted.

F. H. PARKER, President, PAUL BABCOCK, Jr., Secretary.

Your committee on trade, to whom has been referred the question of applica-tion to Congress for the building of the Hennepin Canal by the United States, have given to this subject the attention demanded by its important bearing on the internal commerce of the country, and respectfully report as follows:

In the opinion of your committee there can be little if any question that the proposed opening of a water way from the Mississippi River to the Illinois and Michigan Canal and the great lakes promises highly advantageous results, not only to the Northwestern States, but to the whole northern country east of the Mississippi River. Besides furnishing new means of transport to the Atlantic seaboard for the produce of Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, and other grain-producing States, such a canal would also act as a welcome regulator of railroad freights in the Northwest.

There can be little question, also, that neither private enterprise nor the State of Illinois, within whose territory the canal will be situate, nor any other State directly benefited, nor all these combined, will or can undertake an enterprise which is sure to meet the determined opposition of the railroad interest.

The question before us, therefore, simply is: Shall the United States build and maintain this canal, and can this exchange, in view of the well-grounded opposition to the policy of its internal improvements in general, consistently recommend such action on the part of the General Government?

After mature consideration your committee have come to the conclusion that this question should receive an affirmative answer from your board, and for the following reasons:

The ground on which the Hennepin Canal is to be built has been repeatedly surveyed, with a view to that improvement, by the United States Government, and by other competent parties; the practicability of the project has been established and the cost has been reliably ascertained. The scheme, therefore, can not be classed with a large number of internal improvements annually brought before Congress, which are indefinite in their scope and in the results expected, and of uncertain cost.

The Hennepin Canal further differs from man

CONSTRUCTION OF THE HENNEPIN CANAL,

[Resolution passed unanimously by National Board of Trade, at Washington, January 23-25, 1884.]

Resolved, That the enlargement of the Illinois and Michigan Canal and the construction of the Hennepin Canal, connecting the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers, as by survey recently made by the Secretary of War, are necessary to control and materially reduce the cost of transportation from the fields of production to the great lakes, and that the cheapest possible transport from the interior to the seaboard is indispensable to the retention of foreign markets for our cereals.

[Resolution of Mississippi River Improvement Convention, at Washington, January 23, 1884.]

Resolved, That in the interest of cheap transportation, and to afford a choice of water routes to the seaboard, we regard connections between the upper navigable waters of the Mississippi and the great lakes as of great importance, and that Congress in making appropriations ought to have regard to the establishment of the free water communication between the valley of the great river of the West and the tide water of the East, in accordance with the recommendations heretofore made by the President of the United States in his special message on the subject.

SPEECH

JOHN WINANS, HON.

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 13, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. WINANS, of Wisconsin, said: Mr. CHAIRMAN: Our annual river and harbor bill is looked upon with suspicion by the people and the press, and justly so.

The one of 1882 is still fresh in our memories and will long live in the recollections of those who were identified with its passage and subsequently suffered defeat at the polls by the votes and voices of an in-dignant and outraged people. The then almost universal condemnation of the eighteen million river and harbor "steal," as it was characterized, was in no sense partisan, and the offending member, Democrat or Republican, was relegated to private life.

The bill under consideration carries some twelve millions, and if it becomes a law the Forty-eighth Congress will have appropriated to the alleged improvement of rivers and harbors upward of twenty-five millions of dollars. Will the country sanction this? Sir, in my judgment it will not, and should not, and, as a representative of a sentiment that I believe will condemn it, I must vote against this bill. Within its provisions are included many small streams unknown to commerce, and scarcely of sufficient importance to attract local attention, and we are asked to give the people's money to their attempted improvement—not to benefit commerce, but individuals and localities for purely selfish purpose

I am, sir, in favor of judicious appropriations for the improvement of

I am, sir, in favor of judicious appropriations for the improvement of such of our great water ways as need improvement, as well as to such of our harbors as are really useful to commerce. But, sir, we have been attempting too much, and have accomplished too little to warrant the continuance of our large annual appropriations, and they have assumed the character of waste and extravagance.

Those who should know, and claim to know, say that the millions given to the Mississippi River are barren of results, and still more is demanded and will probably be given from year to year, until the people cry a halt and demand the evidence showing that its navigation has been improved or its commerce benefited.

ation to the harbor at Galveston, Tex. If true, as charged and substantially admitted on this floor, that the Government of the United States has already expended in and about this harbor about $1,600,000, and has succeeded in increasing the depth of water in the channel only three inches, it would seem to the ordinary mind that it would be a waste of money to continue the work. If what has been accomplished has cost about $553,000 an inch, and at the rate of $6,400,000 a foot, it is apparent that by the time the depth of twenty-four feet is obtained—as proposed by the engineers—our Treasury would be bankrupted by the attempted improvement of this one harbor.

Another feet rose of the bill is the construction of the Henneric Carel

Another feature of the bill is the construction of the Hennepin Canal—connecting the waters of the Mississippi River with the great lakes. If this proposition stood by itself, and was to be considered on its merits, I should be inclined to favor it, believing that it would benefit the great Northwest and tend to cheapen our railroad freights. But being as it is, linked with so many other projects of more than doubtful propriety, I must vote against it. I have said enough, Mr. Chairman, to explain why I shall vote against this bill, and that is all I desired to do or care to say on the subject.

Mexican War Pensions.

SPEECH

HON. JOHN W. McCORMICK,

OF OHIO.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 14, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 5667) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCORMICK said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I beg the indulgence of the committee for a few general remarks on the subject of soldiers' pensions. No class of citizens of this Republic, whether in the ranks of the civilian, or in the higher one of official trust, can justly ignore the claims of those men who maintained the integrity of national union and honor. Even the men who fought against them in an effort to dismember the union of States owe them a debt of gratitude for their patriotism, bravery, endurance, and valiant conduct, which leaves us a nation saved, without a single star erased from the banner of union and liberty.

It is no small privilege to take part in the law-making power of the grandest and most powerful nation on God's footstool, while it is at the same time a privilege exacting from him who is so honored the highest sense of rectitude and integrity, loyalty and patriotism, free from any prejudice or sectional feeling in order to recognize the rights of all classes of citizens. It is an honorable thing to recognize merit under all circumstances, and to deal justly with the deserving. In all the history of the past we have the record of the achievements of those who have periled their lives in defense of home and native land, while it has been the pride of nations to properly estimate those achieveit has been the pride of nations to properly estimate those achievements by suitable honors and rewards. As before the altar so before the ballot all men are equal.

No man who has a voice in the law-making power of such a republic as ours should dare, in the light of intelligence and true patriotism, to ignore the claims of the humblest citizen, not only to the full and untrammeled exercise of the elective franchise, but most especially in regard to the just claims of those who have periled their lives and their all to make our country what it is to-day.

During the sessions of the Forty-eighth Congress many just measures have come before us for consideration. Some of these have been promptly considered, and have been enacted into law. Others, equally meritorious, have have not fared so well. Of this latter class is the Mexican pension bill. In my opinion a just criticism may be lodged against our action in regard to that important measure. The hearts of all loyal citizens of this country may well be pained at the filibustering and unnecessary delays that have accompanied this bill since it was first introduced in the House in the beginning of the first session of this Congress. And what has been the result of it all? The soldiers to whom it was intended to give relief, with their widows and orphans, who have asked at the hands of this Congress bread, have received a stone. Against

In the light of all the facts connected with the consideration of this bill this Congress can take to itself but little credit for its action or want of action thereon, and so the whole country will judge of the matter. I believe that this measure as it came from the Senate should become a law before this session closes, as it easily might do if we are only willing to do right and deal justly and trample under foot our narrow differences as men and act the part of liberal-minded and true

The rights of the soldiers who fought the battles of the Mexican war demand it, and we do them great injustice by withholding their just dues. The widows and orphans of deserving Union soldiers de-The petitions of hundreds and thousands of the best citizens all over the country in thunder tones demand it, and yet we pass the matter by as of little moment.

The flimsy excuse that these petitions are worked up by interested claim agents, and on that account are not deserving the attention of this body, will not relieve us from responsibility nor answer for our neglect or delay in this important matter, and we will do well not to delude ourselves or hide behind such a flimsy subterfuge. These petitioners are in earnest in this effort, and they are already wearied by our delays and are in no mood to be trifled with, and we may as well be admonished of that fact.

If we do not heed those petitions we may in the future have occasion to regard their ballots when they again voice themselves in regard to those they place in official trust. When they so voice themselves their verdict will be right, and I believe and dare assert that our dilatory action on the Mexican pension bill will not stand the crucial test when it shall be applied, and it ought not to stand.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I would briefly refer to the Union seidier and express an opinion in regard to his relations to the civil service. These relations should have the widest and most liberal scope when they come to be applied to the veteran soldier who has done valiant service to his country. Without regard to the party in power, in the name of justice as well as of patriotism let his claims be recognized above all others when capacity and fitness attend those claims; and here, if nowhere else, let the principle "to the victors belong the spoils" be null and void, and leave these scarred and maimed heroes undisturbed in places of official trust. It certainly would only be a proper recognition of merit, of justice, and of right.

Rivers and Harbors.

SPEECH

HON. THOMAS P. OCHILTREE,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 3, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. OCHILTREE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The very able remarks submitted upon the Galves Mr. CHAIRMAN: The very able remarks submitted upon the Gaiveston Harbor proposition by my distinguished colleague [Mr. Reagan], whose long, arduous, and eminent services at the head of the Commerce Committee of this House enabled him to speak with profound force and comprehensiveness upon such matters, also the eloquent speech of my other colleague [Mr. MILLS] supplemented by the exhaustive arguments of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD], and the unanswerable statements of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Breck-INRIDGE] would ordinarily preclude me from obtruding my views thereon, but the fact that I am here as the accredited representative of the devoted little city whose dearest interests are involved compels me to join my feeble voice to theirs in defense of the proposition under discussion, and to repel the unwarrantable and slanderous attacks made upon her and hers by this "bird that has (attempted) to befoul its own

The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] has had read from the Clerk's desk an anonymous communication purporting to be an editorial from a Texas paper (God save the mark) animadverting upon the motives that actuate those supporting the item of this bill for Galveston Harbor.

From my knowledge of that gentleman, and his well-known appreciation of fair-dealing, I must confess I was astonished to see him aim this Parthian arrow, dipped in poison, malice, and slander, at the honorable gentlemen who advocate this measure upon this floor.

Sir, the delegation in this House from the State of Texas, of which Sir, the delegation in this House from the State of Texas, of which I am the youngest and most humble member, are insensible to such attacks. They are men of such ability, such honor, such reputation, gained in cabinet and on field, bench, bar, and forum, through long and eventful years of public service, that they can treat with utter scorn and contempt any such imputation; so with regard to the gentlemen who compose the committee representing the city of Galveston, and so with the great journal published at that point that has been so wantonly assailed for the bold and determined manner in which it has seen fit to advocate the measure in question. seen fit to advocate the measure in question.

As the representative of the immediate locality proposed to be benefited, I may be allowed to speak from personal observation in respect to the futile efforts of the ablest of the Government engineers to cut a channel deep enough for our growing commerce through the bar that obstructs that harbor. I have no confidence in the scientific knowledge of any of these gentlemen as adapted to this particular work. I judge of their incapacity by the total absence of any favorable results accruing from their efforts there during the past ten years. No improve-ments can be expected from a continuation of the work either under their original or modified plans.

Engineering, sir, is a progressive art, embracing many sciences. In the line of discovery and progress no science has yet been fully matured. Theories are devised from the observation of facts or supposed facts; but when the scientists come to work upon new theories, it not seldom happens that they fail to obtain expected results, although it would seem that they ought to work to the end in view. The best engineers of the Army approved the plans of improvement at the Galveston Bar. These are the same gentlemen who condemned as impracticable, as unscientific, nay, as absurd, the plans of Captain Eads, the great civil engineer, for the improvement of the channel through the bars at the mouth of the Mississippi River. And now is it seriously proposed to give the direction of a great jetty work to engineers who have failed, and decline the services of the greatest and most successful engineer of the great

The bitterest controversies that the reading public are treated to are the disputes of the scientists. Each school of science and art is in its own opinion as infallible as each religious denomination is in respect to its own peculiar tenets. Who is to decide between them? Let success in their undertakings determine. "By their fruits ye shall know them." Were the world to leave progress to be carried on by the great and learned scientists there would be little progress, and none at all it left to the smatterers and pretenders of that school. These gentlement would not be able to agree in order to reach a starting regim. The diswould not be able to agree in order to reach a starting point. The disciples of each school would know beyond any doubt whatever that the plans of the other were doomed to failure. We have progress and improvements, because while the graduates of rival schools are wrangling over their theories some practical man—for example, Captain Eads—puts them to the test of experiment, proves them by his works, and accepts the results as conclusive on the issues raised. In this manner that great engineer proved his superiority in genius and skill against the opposition and detraction of the whole corps of Army engineers.

The Galveston Harbor is obstructed by two bars—the inner and the outer bars—formed in part by the action of the tides and in part by deposits carried thereto by the currents of the rivers which empty into the Gulf of Mexico at this point. It is agreed on all sides that these bars can be removed by the tides and the friction of these river currents if their force were to be increased by confining their volume within a narrower channel.

Years ago Congress recognized the importance of Galveston as a commercial point and determined to remove the obstructions of these bars. At that time the depth of the water on the outer bar was twelve feet, and a depth of eighteen feet was then considered sufficient for navigation. A survey with this object in view was ordered. The result of this survey was reported by the Chief of Engineers of the Army in his annual report for 1874. The plan adopted was in the nature of a jetty. Under this plan, with various modifications in the construction, the work has been going on nearly ten years. A jetty wall four and one-quarter miles long has been constructed, no part of which is to-day visible. In that time over one million and a half dollars have been expended, and the depth of water on the outer bar, according to the survey made by the Government engineers in July, 1883, was still thirteen feet. The annual report of the Chief of Engineers for 1874 reports the depth of water at twelve feet. After this outlay, and this lapse of ten years, that official informs us that the board of engineers say in respect to a proposition to widen Galveston Harbor-

Nothing should be done until the question of the practicability,- Practicability, mind you, sir-of permanently improving the outer bar shall have been demonstrated.

The engineer officers who have this improvement in charge admit that their attempts are even now but experiments, and that they are not—to quote their own words—in the "possession of facts and data calculated to throw a needed light upon the amount (of money) necessary to be expended for obtaining a proper depth on the bar." Now the queslated to throw a needed light upon the amount (of money) necessary to be expended for obtaining a proper depth on the bar." Now the question to be here decided is whether Congress will leave the work of opening our port to the great ships of the day to these experimentalists or place it in the hands of an engineer who has proved his ability and can estimate the cost—one who has offered to risk his own money on a result of thirty feet in the channel, a permanent result?

Mr. Chairman, the port of Galveston takes rank next after New Orleans, above all other Southern seaports, in her exports of cotton. The export of cotton from the United States in 1883 amounted to 4 626 808.

export of cotton from the United States in 1883 amounted to 4,626,808 bales. This was a larger quantity than that of any of the preceding years. Of this export New Orleans sent out 1,495,099 bales, Galveston 506,993 bales, Savannah 419,006 bales, Charleston 372,902 bales, Wilmington, N. C., 55,579 bales, and Mobile 45,270 bales. More than 11 per cent. of the total cotton export of that year was made from Galveston. If you will refer, sir, for a moment to our foreign commerce statistics, you will find that even during the previous year Galveston took rank as the seventh city of the Union in respect to the value of its commerce.

Here are the official figures showing that fact:

It would be an interesting piece of figuring to calculate the amount of public money spent in improving a score or more of the ports on this table and compare it with that spent at Galveston, whose commerce exceeds their aggregate imports and exports.

It would also be another interesting piece of figuring to calculate the amount which a saving of 5 cents a bushel on Western wheat and compared to the compared t amount which a saving of 5 cents a busiler on western wheat and corn transportation would amount to annually, and how much of this saving might result from making Galveston a safe harbor for large ships. Sir, the enormous and fast-growing commerce has to be lightered over the bar that obstructs our channel. Every dollar's worth passes over that bar. We are developing a large coasting trade and European trade, and our enterprising merchants are doing much to encourage the development of the much-desired South American trade. Coffee constitutes about one-half our imports. Our coastwise trade extends to every port about one-half our imports. Our coastwise trade extends to every port of importance on the Gulf and Atlantic coasts. There are two lines of steamers in this trade to New York alone:

First. The Mallory line, direct, employing seven steamers, of an aggregate tonnage of 18,588 tons, making about eighty trips a year.

Second. The Morgan lines, one to New Orleans, of nine steamers, of less tonnage, making daily trips. And the other a weekly direct to New

A. G. MALLOY, Esq., Collector, Galveston.

True, they talk of a possible depth of twenty-five feet. But how, and when, and at what cost? Will they answer? No, sir; for this possible result they ask an annual appropriation of $500,000 for an indefinite number of years—for their experimental work.

Mr. Chairman, the State of Texas is an empire of itself. Her own resources must soon be developed to an extent that will give the port of Galveston a commerce that would only be second to that of New York. Is it not the duty of Congress to make an outlet for this commerce, to give it a channel-way through the bar that now obstructs it, a channel of a depth sufficient to accommodate the class of large steamers that are now required for such trade? We want a depth of thirty feet at least in the channel, not thirteen feet or eighteen or twentyfive feet. No plan or even suggestion has been made by the Government engineers for such a depth, and yet gentlemen say ''let these engineers have control of the work.'' This, too, sir, in face of the fact that their ten years' effort leaves the bar at just the same depth it was when they commenced it. The million and a half dollars expended by them has been thrown away-sunk out of view on the bar, dissipated at the bar—drank up as it were.

But it is not Galveston nor the great State of Texas that is alone interested in the opening of a 30-foot channel. Turn to your maps, sir, and you will see that Galveston is the natural outlet for that vast mining, grain-growing, stock-raising area of the Union west of the one hundredth parallel. I do not except any part of that vast region east of the Sierra Nevadas, and I would include the wheat lands of California also if we had the proper harbor accommodations. Our railroad connections extend even to them. Galveston is the natural outlet for all the exports of that area. Both time and money would be saved in the export of California wheat if we had a 30-foot channel through our Iowa, Nebraska, and Kansas and the Territories to the west of them are as much interested in this improvement as Texas is. The opening of such a channel would benefit not Galveston alone, but also Chicago and Saint Paul, Detroit and Milwaukee, Saint Louis and Kansas City, Omaha and Denver, Shreveport and Vicksburg, Little Rock and Memphis, and a hundred other thriving young cities of the great Northwest and Southwest.

Our railroad connections extend to all of these. We will reach out and grasp with hooks of steel a half of a continent; and not content with domestic trade bonds alone, we extend our lines into the heart of Mexico by four different routes, namely, via Matamoras, Laredo, Piedras Negras, and El Paso, besides two lines of steamers to the Mexican ports of Vera Cruz, Tuxpan, and Tampico. All the vast trade that will be developed with Mexico by Galveston enterprise must come over these routes, and make that city the chief port of export and import for that new India—that country of untold wealth. Sir, I beg to say that these are not my own views alone; a recent official report of the Bureau of Statistics sets this forth very clearly. I will quote a few passages from it:

The completion of the Mexican National and of the Mexican International Railroad Innes will connect the chief centers of trade and industry in Mexico with the Texas railroad system, which, as already stated, depends chiefly upon the harbor of Galveston for the facilities of ocean commerce.

In a recent report of this office in regard to commerce between the United States and Mexico it was shown that the trade between the two contiguous countries will hereafter be carried on chiefly over railroads. This appears evident from the following considerations: First, nine-tenths of the population of Mexico reside on the high table-lands, where are carried on the chief agricultural and mining industries of the country. Second, the hot, unhealthy belt of land along the Gulf coast (tierra caliente) is repellant to foreign commerce. Third, there is no port of Mexico on the Gulf north of Vera Cruz at which vessels can enter when drawing over ten feet of water, and south of that point there is no harbor at which vessels can enter when drawing over twelve to fifteen feet of water. Vessels of twenty-four feet draught may enter the harbor of Vera Cruz, but at that point are obliged to load and unload by means of lighters while lying half a mile from the shore.

For these reasons it is apparent that upon the completion of the improvement proposed to be made at the entrance to Galveston Harbor, and of the railroads in Mexico in course of construction, that port will be the most accessible of all the Gulf ports for the commerce of the central and northern portions of Mexico with countries beyond the sea.

The area in Mexico which will thus be brought within range of the commerce of Galveston is about as large as that of the State of Texas. The magnitude of this probable commercial development is of course a matter which can only be determined by the results of practical experience under the new conditions governing the commercial relations between the United States and Mexico introduced by the construction of ra

This view is fully supported by many of the best railroad men in the country, and by the boards of trade of the leading cities of the great West, all of which look to Mexico as a rich field for commercial enterprise and to Galveston as the entrepôt of the trade.

The following from the same report corroborates my statement in regard to the comparative extent and importance of the area of country which may be subserved by the port of Galveston:

which may be subserved by the port of Galveston:

The entire territory of which Galveston would become the nearest and most accessible first-class scaport, namely, the States of Texas, Kansas, and Colorado, the Indian Territory, and the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, with parts of contiguous States and Territories, has an area of about 797,000 square miles. This is equal to the aggregate area of the New England States, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, North Catolina, Kentucky, Tennessee, Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, the aggregate population of which States in the year 1830 was 35,756,780, as against a population of only about 3,000,000 within the area referred to as being embraced within the range of the commercial enterprise of Galveston under the favoring condition of a first-class harbor.

The area of which Galveston would thus become the nearest and most accessible scaport is also equal to the aggregate area of Great Britain and Ireland, France, Spain, Italy, and the German Empire, the total population of which countries is about 163,000,000, and is fully equal to those countries in the extent of land susceptible to culture, in fertility of soil, and in all the capabilities of material prosperity.

The comparison as to rainfall in this area and in the countries of Europe referred to is quite favorable to us. These facts suggest the possibility of an enormous increase of wealth and of population within this area described as being within the range of the commercial activities of Galveston. Evidently, the present development of the resources of the State of Texas and of its neighboring States and Territories are to the possibilities of such development but as a beginning. The proposed improvement of Galveston Harbor has therefore a prospective importance vastly exceeding its value to interests which would thereby be subserved at the present time.

Adopt measures, proven measures, not mere experiments of theorists, of proven failures, but measures of successful, practical men, like Captain Eads, that will facilitate the entry of ships into all our harbors. Thus eliminate every removable obstruction from interstate and foreign commerce. Lighten the tolls and charges as far as you can. Offer encouragement to American capital to go into American ships. Encourage civil talent when Military Academy science fails to accomplish needed work.

If you have, under the power to "regulate commerce," the right to restrict its modes of business, you have a fortiori the right to make its channels and modes open and free. This is all that Galveston asks of you in the enactment of your commercial regulations. In this case, sir, we want the military power to be subordinate to civil administration; surface smattering to give way to solid learning and real ability,

If the plan of the Government engineers promised a favorable result, the citizens of Galveston would be the last people in the world to in-terpose any objection to its prosecution. The citizens of Galveston have thrown away a hundred thousand dollars of their own money in that plan. They object to any more public money being wasted in I protested for them against such a waste of money when that plan. last year's river and harbor bill was up for discussion. We denounce these Army engineers as incompetent. The public money appropriated by Congress has been spent by them in conducting a ten years' series of experiments; and yet the bar, like the flag, "is still there," but the jetty is nowhere. No one knows how much money the present works would cost or the time it would involve.

Mr. Chairman, I want this House distinctly to understand that it is admitted by the the highest of your engineer officers that if the so-called north and south jetties should ever be finished on the Galveston Bar according to the official plans the channel contemplated would not, even with the aid of auxiliary works, obtain a greater depth than eighteen feet. This is the depth gravely proposed by your Army engineers, in face of the fact that the class of steam-vessels now engaged in our cotton trade draw from sixteen to eighteen feet in ballast. Out upon such incompetence and absurdity.

I will not discuss the engineering questions involved in the submerged etty system that has failed, or in the Eads jetty system that has been successful beyond promise. I will merely say that the latter system was invented—yes, I think I may justly say "invented"—by Mr. Eads, who, if not the most distinguished engineer of the age, takes equal rank with the most distinguished. By that system a pathway has been opened to the Great Eastern where a few years ago an ordinary coaster would have grounded on mud-banks. When the Galveston was being playing the played Mr. Eads were recorded in secretary to the contract of intrinsic was being played Mr. Eads were recorded in secretary. system of jetties was being planned Mr. Eads was engaged in constructing the Mississippi jetties. Without exception—I think I may say without exception—all the Army engineers who had anything to do with the Galveston Bar plan were unanimous not merely in opinion, but in positive assertion, that Mr. Eads's work must prove a total failure. They insisted that any improvement made at the mouth of the Mississippi River under the Eads plan would prove very temporary. There was no end of scientific argument pointing to the result. But Mr. Eads was no end of scientific argument pointing to the result. But Mr. Each knew what he was doing. He was not conducting an experiment. On the contary, he knew he was right, and that his detractors were as ignorant of the real science of jetty construction as they were of the true theory of tide action on riparian deposits. He was willing to borrow the money to construct his jetties, and to have payment by the Government contingent on the successful results of his skill and labor, even to the smallest detail. The fame of his great engineering feat is now world-wide. Two continents are eager to employ him. His success is as brilliant as the failure of the Army engineers at Galveston is complete.

At the request of the citizens of Galveston, I should say, after repeated urging, Mr. Eads returned from Europe to examine the formation of their harbor obstructions and to consider the question of applying his jetty system for its removal. He made a thorough examination of the bar and of the work done by the Army engineers, and pledged his great reputation against any successful results from such work.

Urged by the solicitation of the people of Galveston and the entire Texas delegation in Congress, Captain Eads thereafter appeared before the committees of the House and Senate that had charge of this matter. This was last May. He presented his views with such force and clearness to these committees that no one who is now willing to give them a careful reading or who has read them impartially can fail to be convinced of the reckless extravagance and the total inutility of the work of the Army engineers at Galveston Harbor; whereas his argument in favor of his own plan bears not only the force of sound scientific reason, plainly presented even to the understanding of a layman, but also the weight that comes with an argument illustrated by practical demonstra-tion and the complete success of an engineering feat that was pronounced impossible by his opponents. Addressing the Senate committee, he said in respect to the present submerged jetties:

Any appropriations to carry out the present plans will simply involve a waste of that much public money, because those plans are radically defective and never will accomplish the purposes designed.

To enable the committee to form an intelligent judgment upon the merits of the Galveston plan, and to forecast the probable results which will attend its completion, it will be important to refer to the general principles or natural laws which control the action of flowing water and its power to transport sand and other sedimentary matter, so far as these laws are involved in the jetty system. To enable the committee also to fully comprehend the reasons which actuated these officers in recommending the Galveston plan, it will be necessary to quote from their official reports some of the ideas which they then entertained, so that the committee may see how completely their plan harmonizes with the errors which possessed their minds at that time.

If the natural laws referred to are clearly understood by the committee, it will have no difficulty in arriving at a correct judgment in the premises. The jetty system is a method of deepening and maintaining a channel across a shoal by such artificial works as shall compel the water flowing over the shoal to pass through a narrow channel. The principles involved in the system may be thus stated in brief:

First. The current is caused by the fall of the water from a higher to a lower level, which fall is indicated by the slope or inclination of the surface of the water.

Second. The friction of the bed over which the water flows is the chief ele-

First. The current is caused by the fall of the water from a higher to a lower level, which fall is indicated by the slope or inclination of the surface of the water.

Second. The friction of the bed over which the water flows is the chief element or force opposed to the current.

Third. The force of the current will be increased by either increasing the slope of surface or by increasing the volume of water passing through the channel, or by increasing both.

Fourth. The friction of the bed controls the volocity of the current just as the application of the brakes to a railway train going down grade without the aid of the engine regulates the velocity at which the train moves. The railway brakes and the friction of the bed are to this extent identical in their effect.

Fifth. The friction increases just as the width of the bed increases. That is to say, if the bed of the channel be twice as great the friction will be twice as great. It is important to remember this fact as we proceed, because friction is one of the very important elements that are totally ignored in planning the Galveston jetties, as will be presently seen.

Sixth. The power of water to transport sand increases with the square of the velocity of the water. That is to say, if the current be made twice as rapid it will be able to transport four times as much sand.

Now, if we consider these simple facts in their application to the plan now being executed at Galveston, it will be apparent that if the jetties, instead of being located 12,000 feet a part (two and a quarter miles), were located, for instance, only 4,000 feet apart, the friction retarding the flow of the water through them would only be one-third as great. Hence, with the same slope of surface from Galveston Bay to the sea, or from the sea to Galveston Bay, the current through them would be greatly accelerated. And as the transporting power of the water increases with its velocity, it would, with this reduced width of channel be much greater, and it would more rapidly exeavate and mai

General Humphreys, Chief Engineer of the Army, considered the Eads plan impracticable. It may not be improper for me to quote the views expressed by that officer and other engineers of high military rank in regard to the Mississippi jetties when they were being constructed by Mr. Eads.

In 1874 the Chief of Engineers said, referring to the head of the South

The mean width of the pass is 700 feet, but a less width for the jetties must be taken if a channel way of suitable width with a depth of 27 feet at low water is to be attained. Assuming 500 feet for this width, then as the width of this bar, where the annual accretion of 111 feet is made, is 3,000 feet, we shall, with jetties 500 feet apart, have an annual advance of 670 feet.

General Newton said at the same time:

It is evident that in proportion as the cross-section of discharge on the outer crest of the deposit or bar widens, its progress into the Gulf will become slower, and, on the other hand, if the cross-section be narrowed, the progress of the deposit will become more rapid. Whether the relative progress be in the simple inverse ratio of the width of discharge, or in some other, it is not important here to inquire. The essential fact that as the width of the cross-section diminishes the rate of progress of the bar into the Gulf must increase is self-evident.

What became of these confident predictions? Let Mr. Eads answer. He said to the Senate committee:

He said to the Senate committee:

General Newton undertook to show that, under the influence of jetties at the mouth of South Pass, to produce only twenty-five feet depth of water the advance of the bar would be at the rate of 2.240 feet per annum! As the jetties have maintained a 30-foot depth of channel for nearly five years, during all of which time there has been no occasion to extend them a single foot, and as there has been no indication of bar advance to justify a belief that it will be necessary to extend them a single foot during the next hundred years, it must be evident that all these distinguished officers were mistaken. If General Humphreys had been correct, I should have had to extend the jetties by this time nearly three-quarters of a mile; if General Newton had been correct, I would have to be at work to-day on the jetty ends two and a half miles farther out, where the water is one hundred and sixty feet deep; and if Major Hovell had been correct, the jetties would be well on their way toward Cuba. When the stubborn facts of 1884 at the mouth of the South Pass are compared with these declarations, comment becomes unnecessary.

the mouth of the South Pass are compared with these declarations, comment becomes unnecessary.

That the entire board which approved Major Howell's plan for Galveston entertained the views expressed by these officers will be seen from the following quotation from their reports to the Chief of Engineers.

Major Howell says (Report of Secretary of War, 1874, volume 2, part 1, pages 732, 733): "The jetties are expected to act as training-walls for the lower ebb channel, while the upper will pass over them. They are calculated to give a depth on the outer bar of from eighteen to nineteen feet, and at the same time only confine and direct so much of the ebb and flood currents as may be useful, thus preventing as great an advance of the bar gulfward as might be expected were the jetties built up to the plane of mean low tide."

At page 737 of the same volume Messrs. Tower, Wright, and Newton say:

"The letter of instructions before referred to imposes the condition that an increased depth of water shall be 'permanently' secured. If taken literally this condition can not, in the opinion of the board, be fulfilled by the present project, or by any other known method of improvement."

This opinion regarding the impracticability of securing a permanent depth of channel is based upon this mistaken theory of bar advance.

After submitting his estimate of the cost, Major Howell says:

"After construction, these jetties will, from time to time, require extension to keep pace with the extension of the bar gulfward."

Mr. Eads's plan of jetty construction was condemned by these scientists on the false theory that in proportion as the channel was narrowed tists on the false theory that in proportion as the channel was narrowed and deepened the greater would be the rate of the "bar advance"—the formation of another bar farther out. And they admitted that the like result would follow their own work on Galveston Bar. Following the theory of these gentlemen to its legitimate conclusion proves to the Senate committee that to obtain the maximum depth of eighteen feet over the outer bar, under the plan of the Government engineers, that "it followed, by their arithmetical theory, that the magnificent width of two and a quarter miles was necessary to be established between the two jetties to restrain the phantom of bar advance."

These gentlemen-

Said Mr. Eads-

totally overlooked the fact that the friction through such a wide channel would neutralize the effect of the current, an increased force of which must be had to insure the deepening of the channel. Forgetful of the retarding effects of friction on such a channel, they then committed their crowning mistake of leaving enormous lateral outlets near the land, through each jetty, by which the current should be still more enfeebled.

Another equally important principle involved in the jetty system was likewise overlooked by them. I allude to the effect of wave action upon the sandy bottom of the shores of the sea.

Mr. Eads then goes on in the address quoted from to show this effect and to explain the laws that control the formation of bars. I will, with the permission of the House, print what he says on this subject as an appendix to these remarks in the RECORD.

The Government engineers admit that their plan carries with it its own elements of failure. Improvement will only be temporary, and at best only eighteen feet of water. On a bar this should give a passage to ships drawing from twenty-five to thirty feet. What does Mr. Eads say as to his plan? Here are his own words:

I have no hesitation in declaring that I can, beyond all doubt, and within a comparatively short time, give to Galveston as good, if not a better, channel than that through the jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi.

This is not the language of mere theory or experiment. It is the language of a man who knows exactly what he can do, who is willing to assume all financial risk, and to ask no pay until he produces the results he promises to perform. In short, Mr. Chairman, it is the language of Eads of Mississippi fame, the greatest of American engineers. Above and beyond all this he is willing to pledge to the success of his work the fame and reputation earned in a long and brilliant professional career, in which he has won honors which do not pale before those show-ered upon the constructors of the Suez Canal, the Mount Cenis Tunnel; or any of the other grand achievements of ancient or modern science.

Mr. Chairman, is not this a work of national importance? Is not the expense incident to its performance justified by the immensity of the interests of the State of Texas and the other States and Territories that look to Galveston as their nearest port of entry, and as a competing point for their traffic and travel? But I will speak of Texas alone—other gentlemen from the vast interior above us are more familiar with the wants and resources of that region.

In 1845 Texas was admitted to the Union with a population of about 170,000; now we have grown to a population of 2,150,000. In 1850 our area of improved farming lands was only 643,976 acres; now the area has grown to about 17,000,000 acres. The value of our real and area has grown to about 17,000,000 acres. The value of our real and personal property is not below $1,000,000,000 to-day. It is probably much greater in amount. Our agricultural products, including increase of cattle and sheep, are not less than $150,000,000 per annum in value. We stand in the first rank as cotton producers. In wool we will soon take the lead of every State in the Union. Our capacity for grain raising, especially wheat and corn, is unlimited. Our mineral resources are simply incalculable. People imagine that we have little or no timber. Why, sir, although most of our area is made up of rich, untimbered prairies, we have of pine land alone an area larger than the State of Indiana, although you might cross our State a dozen times on different lines and miss this little spot on our map, not much larger than one of our ordinary counties. I do not mean to belittle Indiana! It is great among the other States, but small in area when compared with Texas.

In 1860 we developed are all the states of the states of the states of the states of the states. resources are simply incalculable. People imagine that we have little

In 1860 we developed our railroad system to the extent of 300 miles; now we have considerably over 6,000 miles of railroad, valued at $160, 000,000. Outside the State there are at least 5,000 miles of railroad connecting directly with us, all intent on finding an outlet at Galveston for their traffic. We are the banner cotton State, the banner beef and mutton and wool State. There is no agricultural product of importance that we can not raise in greater abundance than any other State in the Union. If you would allow us to make our own commercial regulations we would ask no help from the Government for our port of

We would put in the jetties ourselves; we would sail our own steamships; we would send the Stars and Stripes into every sea and port of the world, and we would show you in a few years the second city of the Union in size, in population, in trade, in wealth, and in elegance. But you will not allow this; you insist upon controlling our port, in taking it under your jurisdiction, in saying what ships shall come and how they shall depart. Give us this small modicum of a right. We do not claim any exclusive privilege of track; we offer an outlet to the entire interior of the whole trans-Mississippi country. Our prosperity, the welfare of this region demand that this great work shall no longer be conducted as a mere experiment. Complete it, and all other communities under our flag must be advanced a thousand-fold beyond all the cost. Thus encourage to friendly industrial and progressive emulation the people of the great Southwest and open its ports to the granges and granaries of the vast interior of the continent, and thus perform your constitutional duty to so regulate commerce that no greater advantage by act of Congress shall be given New Orleans over Galveston, or New York or other Atlantic port over either.

APPENDIX

[Extract from Mr. Eads's address on the improvement of Galveston Harbor, delivered before the Senate Committee on Commerce May 21 and 22, 1884.]

It is simply impossible to permanently maintain between submerged jetties any increase of depth, even if such jetties could produce it. It is necessary to explain wave action so that the committee will fully understand its bearing upon the question of bar advance, as well as upon the maintenance of the channel be-explain wave action so that the committee will fully understand its bearing upon the question of bar advance, as well as upon the maintenance of the channel between the jetties.

The waves of the sea produce no continuously horizontal motion whatever in the water over which they are passing, unless the depth be so shallow that the crest of the wave, when it sinks, will feel the resistance of the bottom. When this occurs a motion of translation or horizontal motion, invariably toward the shore, is induced in the water. Of course, the higher the waves the greater will be the depth at which this horizontal movement will be produced. The waves of the Gulf of Mexico are not high enough to produce this effect sensibly in a greater depth than twenty-five or thirty feet. Waves result from the friction of the wind, and they increase in size in proportion to the "fetch" or distance they are driven under its influence. The fetch in the Gulf of Mexico is limited to about eight hundred miles, and the waves are not, therefore, excessively high. Large waves near the shore are always driven toward the shore, for the reason that a wind blowing off the land can not create them of any considerable magnitude near it, and because the shallower the water in which the waves are traveling the slower will be their progress; hence, if the waves are moving under an impulse parallel to the shore they will be moving at right angles to that shore, and the end of the wave nearest the land will move more slowly because it is in shallower depth. This will cause the waves to come obliquely upon the shore. Hence the horizontal or translatory motion of the water induced by the waves is always toward the land. As they move onward to the beach this horizontal motion increases in velocity until under its impulse the water is driven far out on shore.

Even under the influence of severe storms the transporting power in the Gulf

it is in shallower depth. This will cause the waves to come obliquely upon the shore. Hence the horizontal or translatory motion of the water induced by the waves is always toward the land. As they move onward to the beach this horizontal motion increases in velocity until under its impulse the water is driven far out on shore.

Even under the influence of severe storms the transporting power in the Gult waves is limited to the depth of twenty-five or thirty feet. It increases in strength as they roll into the shallower water; therefore when they rush out upon the beach they are highly charged with sediment; a momentary pause ensues before the retreat of the wave occurs, and during this pause the sand is dropped on the shore. As the return current starts from a state of rest it has less power to carry the sand down to the sea than the rapid current had to bring it out upon the shore. In addition to this, the retreating current has less volume, because during the momentary pause before the ebb sets in the volume of the water, which is one of the elements-producing the current, becomes much less than it was when coming out onto the shore, much of it sinking into the beach, and, therefore, the return current, although induced by the steep slope, will be slower and incapable of transporting all of the sand back again.

In this way the sea waves are continually transporting sand shoreward on the sandy beaches of the sea, and where no littoral currents exist these beaches continue to grow seaward.

The water which issues from any tidal basin such as that at Galveston, or from any river, must struggle to reach the sea through the barriers of sand that are thus continually heaped up by the waves upon the height of the waves, it must follow that the deeper the mouth of the jetty channel is made the less will be the ability of the waves to create a bar in front of that channel. I think it would be simply income to care the feet of the single properior of the barry feet of the Mississippi River.

Instead of there being a through each jetty near the land will be made. (See plan of works in Colonel Mansfield's report of 1880.)

What is known on the Mississippi as the outlet system has undergone the most crucial scientific discussion and careful studying during the last eight or ten years. It has been condemned by the Mississippi River Commission, who were directed by Congress to examine and report upon it, and it has been also rejected by the action of several Congressional committees as a system wholly wrong in principle where the deepening of a channel is to be sought. Although this decision was arrived at four or five years ago, the experimental plan of the Galveston jettles has remained unaltered, and the flood-tides, whose volume should be retained in their outflow to deepen the channel, are allowed to escape over the whole length of the submerged jettles.

Under the mistaken idea of facilitating the inflow of the tide, oblivious of the fact that, if it be made to flow through one single channel of moderate width it will have less friction to retard it, and will more easily fill the bay than if it be made to come in through three wide ones, they proposed two lateral channels near the land end of the jettles. The one through the south jetty, as shown on the plans published in 1880, is a mile long; the one through the north jetty is 10,000 feet, and the one through the direct jetty channel is two and one-quarter miles, making a total width of over five miles. They seem to have wholly forgotten also that these lateral outlets will offer the readiest, shortest, and easiest route for the escape of the ebb tide, which must do all of the excavation required to secure and maintain the improved channel. They evidently believed when planning these novel works that the water will flow in through these short routes to the bay, but will go out through one three times as long to deepen their channel. If we suppose the height of the water at the present outlet of Galveston Bay, between Fort Point and Bolivar Point, to be twelve inches abov mouth of South Pass, said (see report of Secretary of War, 1874, volume 2, part 1, page 885):

"The longitudinal section of its bar and bed by its irregularities indicates very clearly that the shoaling process is going on throughout, and that the pass at the present time is hanging between the condition of a live pass and a stagnant ditch, to the last of which results it must arrive if a revolution in the delta does not redeem it. And this most probable fate will be precipitated by applying the jetty system to its mouth."

In his official criticism of the bill which embodies my proposition to produce thirty feet of water at Galveston, at the sole risk of myself and associates, and without pay if we do not succeed, this same officer says:
"Should Congress be resolved to make a change in the administration of this "Should Congress be resolved to make a change in the administration of this work, at least it will be for the interest of the service to await the construction of the north jetty, and the observations of its effects which will lead to the possession of facts and data calculated to throw a needed light upon the amount necessary to be expended for obtaining a proper depth on the bar."

of the north jetty, and the observations of its effects which will lead to the possession of facts and data calculated to throw a needed light upon the amount necessary to be expended for obtaining a proper depth on the bar."

When we examine the reports of these officers and read the prediction of their chief regarding the South Pass of the Mississippi, which by his scientific reasoning was to be converted into a "stagnant ditch" by the application of jetties instead of being made by them, as it is, the grand highway of a nation's commerce, it can not be wondered that he should utter this plea for "the interests of the service," and declare that they will be promoted by the possession of facts and data by which a needed light can be thrown upon the problem they have in hand. The want of this "needed light" in 1874 caused the present Chief of Engineers not only to oppose the application of the proper method of securing deep water for the great valley of the Mississippi, but also to sustain a hopeless plan to give eighteen feet of water at the chief shipping port of a critical time in this absurd experiment, he recommends that the interests of Texas and the vast section tributary to Galveston be subordinated to "the interests of the service;" and in admitting the lack of this "needed light," he virtually acknowledges what every citizen of Galveston well knows, namely, that the plan to which they are clinging so tenaciously is simply an experiment, which in ten years has produced no substantial benefit whatever, and from which it is utterly hopeless to expect any.

In comparing the cost of the jetties contemplated in Senate bill 1652 with those which were constructed at the mouth of the Mississippi. River for five and a quarter million dollars, it will be observed that the distance to deep water across the bar at Galveston is more than twice as great as it was to the same depth at the mouth of the Mississippi. The cost of extending works out into the sea to twice the distance involves a much greater cost than wou

The two jetties which are required at Galveston will have to be fully nine miles long, and will have to extend out into much deeper water than those designed by Major Howell. In addition to this, as I have already stated, it is absolutely necessary that they be built up, not simply to high tide, but very considerably above it, to prevent the sand from being brought over into the jetty channel from the shoals on the outer sides of the jetties.

Colonel Mansfield reports that the south jetty is only built up to mean low tide through a distance of about four and a quarter miles. The plans for the north jetty show that it is to be built up no higher and for a distance of only about one mile. It is, therefore, unfair, as well as idle, to attempt to compare the cost of this system of low submerged jetties from two to fourteen feet high, and not extending into deep water, with those which must, to be successful, extend out into it and be built to twice or three times the average height of the other, for the reason that the cost of both systems will be as the square of their heights, other things being equal, while the extensions into the deep water will increase in a much more rapid ratio. Besides, the jetties must be capped with heavy concrete blocks or other substantial constructions to resist the force of the waves, whereas the jetty now built at Galveston has no such force to withstand in its submerged condition, and is proportioned accordingly.

In proportion as we build the jetties up to the surface of the water this force of the waves becomes more and more powerful against them. It must be apparent, then, that a jetty to resist their violence, and to stop them from breaking over into the channel, must be vastly stronger than if they be built only up to the level of mean low tide. Hence it is idle to attempt to compare the cost of jettles properly built up to the necessary height, and extending with that height from the land clear out to thirty feet water beyond the bar, with these which have been designed by the United States engineers for Galveston Harbor. As the tide sometimes rises three our four feet above mean low tide, the jettles will have to be built at least eight or nine feet higher than the one now completed by Coloned Mansfield.

The total cost of this jetty wrongly located, and of these insignificant proportions, has been $1,500,000, including the wrecked gabionnade on the north side of the channel.

If the plan of the Government at Galveston possessed real merit, it is not at all likely that the immense territory which is to be relieved by deep water at that harbor would attain the relief sought within the next fifteen or twenty years under the present system of appropriating money to carry on public works; and this system seems so securely fastened upon the country that there is no present appearance of its abandonment. It is not unlikely that if the method by which the mouth of the Mississippi River has bee

HON. RICHARD GUENTHER.

OF WISCONSIN.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 13, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. GUENTHER said:

Mr. Chairman: Having received the following telegrams, petitions, and resolutions relative to the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers as a through route of transportation from the Mississippi to Green Bay, I take the opportunity offered to have them printed in the RECORD. At the same time I wish briefly to state my reasons why I, under the circumstances, do not see my way clear to comply with these requests. On Saturday last I advocated an appropriation for the improvement of the Fox River, without reference to its continuity with the Wisconsin River as a through route.

Although I fully believe that the interests of commerce will be suffi-Although I fully believe that the interests of commerce will be sufficiently advanced by completing this projected through route so as to warrant an expenditure of perhaps $5,000,000, I still think that, in view of the opinions found in the report of the Chief of Engineers, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors was justified in not making an appropriation for it at present. At the same time I am warranted by this same report in asserting that the committee did wrong in not making an appropriation for the Fox River, and on Saturday I think I made this latter opinion perfectly clear to the members of this House.

The board of engineers appointed by order of the Secretary of War

The board of engineers appointed by order of the Secretary of War, and composed of Colonel Newton, Lieutenant-Colonel Abbot, and Lieutenant-Colonel Comstock, dated January 5, 1884, say, on page 1915 of the report of the Chief of Engineers:

The board have discussed the engineering features but have not reported upon the commercial value of the improvement of the route of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, which seems also implied in the words "whether in their judgment the interests of commerce and navigation will be advanced sufficiently to warrant the continuation and completion of the project," as the present moment appears a little premature; because additional and careful observations upon the Wisconsin are necessary to certify to the amount of the improvement made, and the feasibility and cost of making the improvement sufficient for the wants of commerce along a through route from west to east.

And further on, on pages 1916 and 1917, they say:

The value of a water route along the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, as a means of through transportation from west to east, it will be conceded must mainly depend upon the improvement of the upper Mississippi, and the necessity for haste in prosecuting additional works of improvement is not therefore apparent, without looking to the further consideration that the cost of a water route along this line and its sufficiency, except through a canal along the banks of the Wisconsin, are not yet determined.

Colonel Houston in his report to the president of the board of engineers says, page 1928:

In view of what has been said, it would seem to be sound policy to suspend for the present the improvement of the Wisconsin River until at least it shall appear that the demands of commerce require it.

These opinions from the officer in charge of the work and a special board of engineers prompt me not to demand an appropriation this year for the through route, but insist upon it that the clause in the bill directing the Secretary of War to cause a further examination, with instructions to report to the next Congress the feasibility, cost, and propriety of continuing it, should pass, as well as my amendment to appropriate a sufficient sum for the prosecution of the improvement of the Fox River as an independent work. Madison, Wis., February 12, 1885.

To Hon. RICHARD GUENTHER, M. C.:

At the request of many cities on the Fox and Wisconsin, I would urge an appropriation for the improvement of those rivers as of vital importance to this State.

J. M. RUSK, Governor,

We, the undersigned, owners and captains of vessels navigating the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, view with alarm the doubt hanging over the appropriation for the continuance of the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, and therefore we earnestly petition you as representing our interest in Wisconsin, that you spare no efforts to secure the appropriation, believing as we do that the completion of this improvement will secure to the country a most valuable channel of commerce between the Mississippi and the lakes:

Resolved by the common council of the city of Green Bay, I have the honor of sending you a copy of the following resolution passed unanimously by that body on February 6, 1885:

Resolved by the common council of the city of Green Bay, That the members of Congress from the State of Wisconsin be, and hereby are, requested to use all honorable endeavors to acquaint the Committee of the House of Representatives on Rivers and Harbors with the importance of the improvements of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, and to obtain an immediate appropriation for the prosecution and completion of said work.

Resolved, further, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded by the city clerk to Senator Sawyers, and also, in view of the illness of our member, Hon. J. Rankin, a copy be sent to Hon. Richard Guenther, who has always been an active and carnest friend of said improvement.

Very respectfully,

Hon. R. GUENTHER, M. C., Washington, D. C.

[Resolutions of the Oshkosh Business Men's Association.]

Resolved, That we deem that the best interest of the country, especially that portion bordering upon the upper Mississippi and its tributaries, demand a liberal appropriation for the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers.

Resolved, That we believe when the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers is completed a large portion of the Northwest will be very much relieved of the burden at present imposed by the railroads for the transportation of the produce of that section of the country.

Resolved, That the secretary of the association forward a copy of these resolutions to our Senators and Members in Congress.

At a special meeting of the common council of the city of Neenah, Wis., held on the 7th day of February, 1885, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Mexican Reciprocity Treaty.

SPEECH

THOMAS J. WOOD, HON. OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 13, 1885,

On the Mexican reciprocity treaty.

Mr. WOOD said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Legislation is proposed in this House to carry into effect the terms of the Mexican treaty. This treaty admits free of duty to our markets twenty-eight articles, all of which come in free under our tariff act excepting seven, and the treaty removes the tariff from these also. Mexico agrees to receive free of duty seventy-three articles from the United States, of which sixty-seven are now subject to pay an average Mexican duty of 80 per cent. of the appraised value. I regret that farm products of the United States are excluded, but it is worthy of our support for opening a new and extensive market for our machinery and manufactured goods. Should this treaty prove to be mutually beneficial to both countries, as I believe it will, it will be enlarged by another, to admit free of duties our agricultural products.

4 The producers of food and manufactured goods in the United States want to trade with the people of Mexico, as the volume of existing trade shows, though it is hampered by high duties in the revenue laws of both countries.

Mexico is our neighbor and only divided from the United States by a surveyor's line. She is bound to this country now by a complete railway system which promises a revolution in trade and business throughout her domain. The commercial advancement of this country, created by our capital and railway system, belongs to us. Shall the expanded trade of Mexico, through a railway system connecting her capital with the city of New York, go to other countries? The capitalists of the Unithe city of New York, go to other countries? The capitalists of the Unted States are developing this country, developing its trade; and shall other countries receive its advantages? If we do not command it other countries will, and our people will regret the loss of increased trade through their own work of development. What! Our capital invested, a railway built to the capital city of another country for the only purpose of increasing trade and commerce, and we refuse that trade and commerce by unfriendly laws on our statute-books? Developing Mexconvirts our railway system and by our capital for the heavilt of for ico with our railroad system and by our capital for the benefit of for-eign countries! This House will not do that by refusing to pass this

The trade of Mexico is not bound to any foreign country, and the Mexican people are willing to trade with us. What is the advantage of their trade? Mexico has a territory comprising 1,224,996 square miles and a population of 10,000,000 of people, and is therefore a country capable of a large and increasing trade with the United States. Her vast mineral wealth awaits development. Hear me while I review the tangible wealth of this republic, the greater part of which has gone and tangible wealth of this republic, the greater part of which has gone and is going to other countries. The annual coinage of gold, silver, and copper averages $20,500,000. The whole amount of coinage since the copper averages $20,500,000. The whole amount of coinage since the establishment of the mints up to 1875 was $3,001,237,281.62. In the colonial period from 1537 to 1821 the amount of silver coined was $2,082,260,657.44; gold, $68,778,411; copper, $542,893.37; making a total of $2,151,581,961.81. Since the establishment of the republic, 1822 to 1875, silver coined, $797,055,080.71; gold, $47,327,383.11; copper, $5,272,855.93—a total of $849,655,319.84. Total silver coined, $2,879,315,738.21; total gold coinage, $116,105,794.11; total copper coinage, $5,815,740.30. Grand total coniage, $3,001,237,281.62.

In the last five years foreign capital has been invested in the mines, and the average estimate is twenty-one and a half millions per year, which would make $102,500,000 more, making the sum total up to the year 1880 of $3,103,737,281.62. It must be remembered that this immense metallic wealth came from the crudest process of mining and is the product of only a few of the valuable mines in this country. The best mines are not remunerative under the Mexican system of mining; but mines are not remunerative under the Mexican system of mining; but a rapid advancement is being made in reaching and reducing the valuable ores. Our successful mining system introduced there will develop fabulous wealth in the unexplored mines of Mexico. What other country on the globe can show such a precious metallic record? Where has this vast amount of coined gold, silver, and copper gone? It is not in

Mexico.

If this coined wealth was in Mexico to-day it would give over $300 per capita for every man, woman, and child. The masses of the people are poor, but the nobility are rich. This great wealth grasped by the nobility caused vice, idleness, and usurpation, until that great country was many times torn and despoiled by the ravages of merciless armies and hordes of banditti. It was the turbulent spirit of the rich nobility, always struggling to rule the Government, and not the want of ample wealth, that has kept back Mexico to the rear of civilized progress and enlightenment. Where is this fabulous wealth? Other nations have it. For one hundred years the old countries of the East have carried away her gold and silver, given for the products of their laboring people sold in her markets. The United States has been a century witnessing this cash market go into other hands when she might have long ago called it her own. Will she refuse it now when it is within her grasp?

During years past the trade of foreign countries with Mexico was nearly a cash transaction with the latter, as you will see by the Mexican export of precious metals. During the fiscal year of 1882 and 1883 Mexico exported nearly $30,000,000 of gold and silver coin and bullion, while her whole export trade for the same year was about $41,000,000. Here was about $11,000,000 of exchange of products and $30,000,000 of precious metals paid and exported. You may examine the statistics of the cious metals paid and exported. You may examine the statistics of the Mexican export trade for many years past and you will find that this is the proportional average. Of this $41,000,000 of export the United States received only about $8,500,000, while $32,500,000 went to England, France, Germany, and other countries. What was this enormous sum of precious metals given for? For the same articles that this country is able to transport there and sell. If the history of trade in this countries is the countries of the foreign and against the first of the first try in the past is any guide for the future, our agricultural products, the products of our mills and factories will find in Mexico a willing market and coin payment.

A cash market for our products is the best in the world. Our whole country would soon feel a new life in every trade and business from the steady influx of the precious metals of Mexico, given for the products of our labor, capital, and skill. But what is the future of this undeveloped country of which we will partake if we pass this bill? The states of Zacatecas, Sonora, Chihuahua, Durango, San Luis Potosi, Hidalgo, Mexico, and Michoacan contain within their mountain ranges veins of gold and silver in inexhaustible riches. These and other states contain also metals and mineral substances, such as copper, iron, zinc, contain also metals and mineral substances, such as copper, iron, zinc, lead, magistral, antimony, arsenic, cobalt, amianthus, and copperas in exhaustless quantities, not mined at all. Carbonate of soda in unlimited supply is found on the lands around Lake Tezcoco.

The white and colored marble quarries attract the capital of Europe. The alabaster of Tecale, in the state of Puebla, with the platina and quicksilver mines, will add to accumulating wealth in the course of development. Then there is the full supply of the spices and all the fruits of the tropics of large commercial value. What was our trade with Mexico before the Mexican Central Bailroad was built, built by with Mexico before the Mexican Central Railroad was built, built by the expenditure of sixty millions of money, mostly advanced and controlled by our own citizens?

In 1880, before the Mexican Central was built, we exported to Mexico $7,866,493 and imported from Mexico $7,209,593. We sold a little more than we bought.

In 1883, when this line of railroad was not completed, but in operation for a long distance in Mexican territory, we imported from Mexico $8,177,123, and exported to that country $16,587,620. We sold more than double the amount we bought. We therefore brought into this country over $3,000,000 of coin cash for our products. Since this line of railway has been completed to the City of Mexico and connected with our great network of railroads from east to west and north to south, I understand that the trade has more than doubled, though it is too early for the printed statistical report; yet who can doubt that our trade with

This treaty, if adopted, will give it a great stimulus and create a friendly confidence between the people and tradesmen of the two republics, and thereby her present trade and increased commerce in the future will be turned into our hands. What will we lose by fully adopting this treaty? The loss of revenue by admitting the seven additional articles free of duty only amounts to $89,658.59. We can well afford this loss. The sugar-planter of Louisiana objects. He has no cause for alarm. During the last fiscal year the import of sugar from Mexico. for alarm. During the last fiscal year the import of sugar from Mexico was only 1,792,171 pounds, valued at $63,419. This limited import of sugar can not be considered competition with the home product. At the present time Mexico is not a sugar-producing country. She does not produce sugar enough for home consumption.

If this was a great sugar-producing country, would not the fact have been known to the ready capitalist of Europe long before this decade, and would they not have willingly developed sugar production there as they have done in Cuba, Porto Rico, and all the Spanish Antilles? The fact that the Mexican people are short of sugar supply argues well against great sugar production in Mexico. I would rather believe that against great sugar production in Mexico. I would rather believe that with the increased trade which the treaty will give, our own sugar producers will find a market in Mexico. What will we sell to the Mexican people if this treaty is adopted? Chiefly our manufactured goods and machinery. Tools required for mining, wagons, carts, and carriages, railway coaches and railway equipments, clocks, pumps, and steam-engines, locomotives, iron and steel railway bars, iron beams, machinery and apparatus of all kinds for industrial, agricultural, and mining purposes, plows and plowshares, crude and refined petroleum. mining purposes, plows and plowshares, crude and refined petroleum, powder, stoves, staves, telegraph and barbed fence wire, all kinds of water-pipes, and many other articles.

I regard this treaty as the beginning of a great trade, and we should accept it as a beginning, fully believing that both the contracting parties will soon hereafter demand a new and enlarged treaty, admit-ing free the products of the farm.

I favor commercial treaties with all the South American states be and an arrival reactes with all the south American states because their trade legitimately belongs to us and ours to them, as an American endowment; and this treaty, if successful, will be followed by others that will give us a wide trade with them. The rejection of this bill, in my judgment, would be tantamount to a declaration that we do not want any of the trade of other countries. It would be, in substance, an order to foreign tradesmen to stay away from our com-mercial centers and keep off of our business thoroughfares, and the cherished policy of two-thirds of the American people, of wider markets for the products of the farm, mills, looms, and furnaces would receive a wounding thrust in the very house of its declared friends.

I will not refuse a treaty because it excludes some of our surplus products and admits others. I would like all to be admitted; but if I can not sell agricultural products and can sell the products of our man-ufactories I would sell them, and vice versa. That would seem to be friendship and generosity to every industry in this country, which I would, with open hands, build up for the general good of the common-

Amicable trade relations with other countries is necessary; sooner or later we must seek the markets of other countries. This country to-day is burdened with overproduction. It demands relief by an untram-

In nearly every department of industry in this country there is greater In nearly every department of industry in this country there is greater production than consumption. It is a plethoric condition of business that rarely exists in any country. It demonstrates the fertility of our lands, the industry and economy of our people. It demonstrates the wealth of our mines and the climatic conditions essential to full and complete production. It demonstrates to the world our abundance of capital, capability and energy of our business men, who were willing to venture in the development of our natural resources, which have no equal in any other country. Endowed with richer resources than any other land on the globe, why will we cease to produce more than we other land on the globe, why will we cease to produce more than we consume? Why will we not sell our surplus bread and provisions to the millions barely subsisting to-day? Why will we not sell the surplus products of our looms, mills, and furnaces in all countries having no manufactories? This people can not stop production now. They are too far into the business to back out, and they will go on. What are our agencies of production?

During the last several years there has been a large import of producing laborers, who have located upon the rich lands of the great West, tilled the soil with care, and it yielded an immense surplus of West, tilled the soil with care, and it yielded an immense surplus of the staple cereals. The young farmers every year leaving the homestead to open new farms, raise more than they consume. Inventive genius has in the last quarter of a century brought into use labor-saving machinery in a thousand forms, facilitating and rapidly advancing the work of agriculture. The handiwork of the inventor in the cotton and woolen mills, in the iron and steel industries, in the refineries, and other kinds of manufacture has caused a revolution in the rapidity of all manufactured products. All these, operating upon nature's rich and convenient resources, have given this plethoric condition, and I tell you it is likely to continue, for this country is not going backward

The cultivated farms will not cease to grow the golden grain; new farms will be added by the American boys, and the emigration of farmers from the old countries will not cease. Capital is always restless and best serves its master when in ceaseless activity, and it will turn the wheels of every manufacturing industry though it may be idle for a season. The great manufacturing plants of America can not long rea season. The great manufacturing plants of America can not long remain idle. The millions invested in them will not be permitted to rot and rust. How will you stop this plethoric growth? Not, I trust, by telling men to quit work; not by stopping the plow, the reaping and thrashing machines; not by closing down the mills and the factories. That would be business suicide. Will you order labor to cease, improvements to suspend, business to decline until the natural growth of the country comes up to the level of consuming its own productions?

If so, how long must we wait?

so, how long must we wait:

The productive capacity of the farms and the manufacturing industries are far ahead of the consumptive power of the country. What is the remedy? It is wider markets. Sell everywhere. Make treaties, advantageous treaties, and sell. Sell our machinery and manufactured goods in one country and the products of the farm in others, if necessary. Go out into the world. Challenge England in all her ways over the sea. The sea is for America as much as it is for England. If any law on the The sea is for America as much as it is for England. If any law of the statute-book forbids this market for the surplus products of our labor, repeal the law or amend it to aid present conditions rather than preserve it to hamper the best energies of the country. Remove trade restrictions and invite rather than repel the trade of nations. Send away the surplus to other markets and let the farmer's plow turn the soil, let the reaper do the utmost in gathering the harvest. Let the thoroughfares of trade be crowded in the movement of cereal surplus. wheels of industry turn and send the manufactured products to countries where manufacturing is scarcely known and the end of stagnation in trade and plethora of business will come.

A fair commercial treaty between this country and the South American states would be the next movement of the treaty-making power, in case the pending treaty is confirmed. Our country should acquire the major part of the South American trade on equitable terms. What is the extent of this trade which other nations, more shrewd than our own, continually covet? Take the trade of Brazil, for example. Her trade with the United States, England, and France aggregates about $110,000,000, of which the United States take $50,266,000. The United States receives nearly one-half of the Brazilian export trade, yet Brazil receives from the United States only $8,695,000, while England sends to Brazil goods valued at $31,092,000, and buys Brazilian products to the amount of $29,835,000.

France sells in Brazil $15,657,000 and takes from Brazil $29,216,000. Here is the fact, that our imports from Brazil are nearly one-half of the total export of that country, and we sell there about one-ninth of the whole value of goods sent into that country. No country can prosper by such unequal commerce as our country has with Brazil. We buy of Brazil over $50,000,000 and Brazil buys about eight and a half millions from us. This trade could be equalized by a commercial treaty. The other South American states would follow the example of Brazil, and soon we would be master of the South American trade. The old countries of the East—England, France, and Germany—do not permit a plethoric condition of trade commodities at home. They load their merchant-ships and order them out to the sea.

It has just been officially announced that Germany has concluded a commercial treaty with the Transvaal Republic. England was a competitor in this treaty, but Germany outdid her. I want fair treaties, not one giving a foreign country advantages over us as the Spanish-American treaty does. By that treaty the United States takes about sixty millions of dollars' worth of the sugar and tobacco products of Cuba and the Antilles, while our trade with them can not exceed fifteen millions; and our less of resemptance of the sugar and tobacco products of the sugar and tobacco products of Cuba and the Antilles, while our trade with them can not exceed fifteen millions; and our less of resemptance of the sugar and tobacco. ions; and our loss of revenue would amount to nearly forty millions, and our people would not get free sugar at all. Under this treaty free sugar coming into our ports would not rule the price of sugar, but the imported sugars from other countries paying the duties would rule the ported sugars from other countries paying the duties would rule the price. Our Treasury would lose a large revenue, and the consumers of sugar would get no advantage in a lower price of that article.

I would not make sugar free. That step would be such a sacrifice of revenue that very little, if any, tax reduction could be made on other high-tariff articles necessary to the comforts of life. I object to the repeal of the tariff on any one or a number of articles unless it be salt, coal, and lumber. The reduction should be general throughout the list on the basis of true reform of the customs laws. To make sugar free is to continue the high tax on woolen, cotton, and iron and steel goods. I would treat all the industries alike.

It is said we have no merchant marine. I lament our weakness here; but if we encourage the trade of nations, soon America will have a grand merchant marine that will be a competitor of England and other countries. Every other civilized country sends away its surplus to other nations for barter and sale, and thereby keep their workingmen employed all through the year.

England sells her surplus wherever she can, so does Germany, so does France. Even Mexico and Brazil are doing the same thing. This country does not. She lags back in the wake of commercial progress with the world. Objection is made to this treaty because it abrogates the revenue laws. I do not want free trade. We must have a tariff. The question is, Shall it be a high tariff for the purpose of protection, or a tariff for the purpose of revenue? How high shall the tariff be? I say it should be high enough to bring to the public Treasury sufficient revenue. That is a pretty high tariff. Our Government requires about $200,000,000 of revenue from the tariff. That requires a pretty high duty, and while it raises enough revenue it gives $200,000,000. high duty, and while it raises enough revenue it gives $200,000,000 protection to home industries. Is that not enough protection? A revenue tariff is protection to the extent of the duty fixed. I would not favor any treaty that would materially interfere with the revenue

Our country, acting upon the principle of national comity, should make a friendly power in Mexico, in whose territory there would be no enemy or neutral ground in the time of possible conflict between it and the strong nations of the east ever ready for war. The Monroe doctrine, adhered to by the United States, and the restless dissatisfaction with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty are going to precipitate a crisis at no distant day, and a clash of arms for mastery. In that time it is well for us if no foreign alliance be formed with Mexico. My friends, be not flattered into insensibility as to this coming issue by our power and prestige. It is coming; I tell you it is coming, and I beg you not to be idle in making complete defense on land and sea.

Again, shall we refuse this treaty and arrest our commanding power over contiguous territory, which will result in the ultimate extension of republican institutions until all the people of North America shall know one government and honor one flag?

I cordially support this bill to carry into effect the Mexican treaty, believing that is an important step in the direction of the world's commerce, which will bring employment to idle workmen, prosperity to the farmer, the mechanic, and the manufacturer.

Rivers and Harbors.

SPEECH

HON. BURR W. JONES,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 3, 1885,

On the bill (II. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: In the few minutes I shall occupy I only wish to state my reasons for declining to vote for this bill in its present form.

Last year we were told that the river and harbor bill had been somewhat increased beyond the orginal expectation by reason of the fact that in the previous year no appropriation had been made; that in fact it was two years' expenditure in one. Now there is no such excuse; and yet the bill has attained the handsome proportions of $12,300,000. Not only that, it begins by small appropriations three colossal schemes. It is said the improvement of Galveston Harbor, of the Hennepin Canal, and that of Sandy Bay will each cost about $8,000,000. There are not only millions in the bill, but millions yet to come.

I shall vote against the bill because it involves a greater expenditure of money than my judgment approves. The Secretary of War recommends about $4,000,000 less than is provided in this bill. In my judgment he recommends enough.

Extravagance is not the worst feature of the bill. The committee have again sanctioned what I regard as a very dangerous practice, to which I will now call attention. We employ Government engineers. We pay them liberally. The presumption is that they know something. Captain Eads would probably call this a violent presumption, and yet we have to indulge it. The engineers make their elaborate surveys. We pay the Public Printer thousands of dollars for printing their thousands of pages of reports.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors come before us with their bill.

They make their explanations. Their stereotyped argument is that this or that improvement is necessary because the Government engineers approve it. That this or that appropriation is not extravagant because it is only 25 or 30 per cent. of the estimate. In short, the whole bill is based every year upon these official reports. Those reports justify the committee when they come before us and they justify us before the people. And yet what practice is now sanctioned by this

When the committee put in their bill $2,500 to improve the With-lacooche River, or the Choctawhatchee, or the Choptank, or Butter-milk Channel, or other rivers and creeks with euphonious names, they plant themselves on the report of the engineers.

Where the improvements are of such a character that the owner of a country mill-dam or the captain of a flat-boat could manage them with success, they invoke the science of the engineers. But when they come to the great enterprises in which millions of dollars are to be expended they ignore the engineers; they send them ignominiously to the rear.

There is, for instance, the project of the Hennepin Canal. It is true the language of the bill would give to the casual reader the impression that the work is to be carried on pursuant to the recommendation of the engineers. But the fact is that the committee utterly disregard the recommendations of the engineers by requiring that the canal shall terminate at or below Rock Island. This is not the route which the engineers nate at or below Rock Island. This is not the route which the engineers approve. They report that by this route the distance from the upper Mississippi region is forty miles greater than by the Marais d'Osier route. That at the same time by the latter route the navigation over the Rock Island rapids is avoided. The engineers report that the cost of the northern or Marais d'Osier route would be less by a million dollars. I quote a few lines from the official report:

The Marais d'Osier route presents these advantages over the others: It is the shortest and most practicable line between the two rivers. The nature of the country through which it passes renders the construction of all work upon it easier, and hence its cost of construction less. The annual cost of maintenance is less. And it is more than likely the expense of extraordinary repairs and renewals will be less. The supply of water is the best and better regulated.

Are we all engineers? Have we such special knowledge of this subject that we should reject the only official report we have, and blindly commence spending $8,000,000 for a canal over a route which the engineers do not commend? Would we spend our own money after that reckless fashion? The Northwest may want a Hennepin Canal, but the tax-payers of the Northwest do not wish to join in paying $8,000,000 to project a canal over a route which must be a comparative failure. Probably nine-tenths of the freights to be transported over such a canal would come from the region north of Rock Island. The vast interests of the Northwest should not be sacrificed to the wants of any single city.

I claim, as I claimed one year ago, that if this canal is to be built it should be built on a route to be selected by competent engineers, responsible to the Government for their work. If after that precaution the work should prove a failure, we could not be accused of having disregarded the advice of skilled engineers and of squandering the public money in reckless caprice.

But this is not the most glaring instance of the practice to which I object. The bill contains an appropriation of $750,000 to be expended object. The bill contains an appropriation of $750,000 to be expended under the management of Captain Eads for the improvement of Galveston Harbor—the commencement of another $8,000,000 enterprise. What do we hear as the justification for this large expenditure? We are told that during the past ten years $1,500,000 have been expended in improving this harbor, and that it has been money thrown away. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Blanchard] says that the depth of water has been increased three inches, and no more. Well, the river and barbor enthusiasts need not despair. At this rate of progress they and harbor enthusiasts need not despair. At this rate of progress they will gain nearly a foot in thirty-six years; and in five hundred years, if the Treasury holds out and the Gulf of Mexico is not dry land, the requisite fourteen feet will be nearly won.

Members of the committee have argued upon this floor that thus far the work on Galveston Harbor has been a stupendous failure. I am not inclined to quarrel with them on that proposition. They may enjoy whatever solace there is in the triumph of that argument. But they ask us to take a long leap in the dark to the next proposition, which is that if we place Captain Eads in charge and expend $8,000,000 more the work will be a success.

Some of us can not help indulging the suspicion that no amount of money and no number of captains can avail to change the nature of the fickle quicksand of Galveston Harbor.

Captain Eads is of the opinion that the theory of the Government engineers is superlative folly. I have not had the pleasure of reading what the engineers say about Captain Eads. No doubt they heartily reciprocate his opinion, and return his compliment. Now, which side of this interesting quarrel are we to espouse? The committee have made their choice by routing the official board and installing Captain Eads. They propose by their bill to pay him a salary of $5,000 per year to carry on this work, for which the Government is to pay $8,000,000 or more. Not only that, they propose to pay him a commission upon such water as he can cajole into Galveston Harbor, provided it will only stay. It was stated on the floor by one of the committee that in addition to the yearly salary this bonus, if I may so call it, would amount to $50,000 or $60,000.

This bill commands the Secretary of War to immediately engage the Captain Eads is of the opinion that the theory of the Government

This bill commands the Secretary of War to immediately engage the services of James B. Eads. It seems to divest the War Department of services of James B. Eads. It seems to divest the War Department of all responsibility except that it is to provide with scrupulous care that Captain Eads receives his pay. For the purposes of this work Captain Eads is to be Secretary of War. True, it is not provided that he may wholly discharge the Secretary of War. Nor do I see any way in which the Secretary of War can discharge Captain Eads.

But I can easily see that a Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers of the Government, having some proper sense of the responsibilities of their office, might regard it as something more than an affront to have fosted over them a new commander in chief even though he he Captain Capt foisted over them a new commander-in-chief, even though he be Captain Eads, and even though he wears the modest title of advisory engineer. Any one who will carefully read the provisions of this bill must conclude that Captain Eads is made by it the absolute autocrat of this vast enterprise.

But this is not all. The bill not only gives Captain Eads a patent on the Gulf of Mexico and Galveston Harbor, but on the Mississippi River. On page 39 of the bill provision is made for expending $2,800,000 on the Mississippi River. Heretofore these improvements have been managed by the Mississippi River Commission. This commission consists of seven commissioners, six of whom are engineers. They are each paid a salary of $3,500 per year.

By this bill Captain Eads virtually supersedes the commission, and yet the commission is not abolished. The commissioners have the poor privilege of preparing plans and estimates, but the Napoleonic Captain Paythe scratch of his pen Eads is given the unlimited power to amend. By the scratch of his pen the plans of the commission become waste paper. In other words, these commissioners are made by this bill the handy and accommodating clerks of Captain Eads.

The office of advisory engineer is created with a salary of $3,500 per year. Now note the language:

And James B. Eads is hereby recommended to the President for that position.

If such a bill had been presented to Andrew Jackson for his signature he would have been very likely to say, in language more emphatic than I will use, that the appointment of officers belonged to him and that the recommendation of Congress would be valuable when asked for.

We are told that Captain Eads is a remarkable man. I am forced to believe it. If he were not he never could have induced this intelligent committee to come before the House with the remarkable propositions contained in this bill. But for one I can not sanction such legislation. I do not like to make the humiliating confession that there is but one man in America who knows anything about the improvement of rivers and harbors.

I am not inclined to condemn in this wholesale way the Government engineers. I am quite as willing to take their judgment upon this work or other works as that of Captain Eads. It is noticeable that Mr. Eads presents no plans, no estimates, no surveys to guide our judgment in this vast expenditure. He simply asks for a sublime faith in himself and for $8,000,000, and the work shall be done. But when I reflect self and for $8,000,000, and the work shall be done. But when I reflect that he is to have $5,000 per year, besides a royal bonus for his work on Galveston Harbor; that he is to have $3,500 per year for his services on the Mississippi River; when I hear it asserted that he is also to be handsomely paid by the city of Galveston, the whole business smacks too strongly of money for Captain Eads, that he should be accepted as an impartial witness. If the committee shall cling to all of the propositions contained in this bill I shall be neither surprised nor disappointed to see it meet with the utter defeat it will deserve.

Interstate Commerce.

SPEECH

HON. WILLIAM E. ENGLISH.

OF INDIANA,

Tuesday, December 16, 1884,

On the bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce, and to regulate such commerce.

Mr. ENGLISH said:

Mr. SPEAKER: There are in this country, I believe, some 125,000 miles of railroad and $6,000,000,000 aggregate capital invested therein, and I should never advocate that any unjust course should be pursued by this House toward these great, necessary, and useful interests. while I am opposed to any unjust action toward the railroad corporations, I am equally opposed to any unjust action by the railroad corporations. I shall not attempt to enter into any discussion as to the constitutional merits of the pending measures to regulate interstate commerce, but shall be content to leave that question where it rightfully belongs, to the courts of the country. In my humble judgment, Congress has the right to regulate commerce between the States; and of the pending measures I much prefer the bill of which my distinof the pending measures I much prefer the bill of which my distinguished friend and near neighbor in this House, Judge REAGAN, is the author. It is simple, plain, and direct. It says what it means and means what it says. There is no circumlocution or ambiguity about it, but it strikes directly and forcibly at the evils that have arisen under the rule of corporate monopoly. Year by year, under the fostering rule of the party in power, the great railroad corporations of the country have become more and more grasping and arrogant and less regardful of the rights of all the people. Having "grabbed" the public lands right and left, in all directions, to the extent of hundreds of millions of acres, having fattened and increased at the expense of the millions of acres, having fattened and increased at the expense of the nation, they have formed great and powerful pools and combinations which place the internal commerce of the country practically at their mercy; and their mighty influence, outstretching and far-reaching in every portion of the country, has in many instances influenced courts and controlled legislation, until, arrogant and inflated with unchecked power and unbridled success, they have ceased to consider that ordinary people have any rights which powerful and unscrupulous corporations are obliged to respect. The injurious effects upon the interest of the general public of these great corporation pools and combinations is so well expressed in the decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania in the case of the M. R. R. Co. vs. Barclay Coal Company (68 Penn., 173) that I ask leave to quote it here:

The effects produced upon the public interests lead to the consideration of another feature of great weight in determining the legality of the contract, to wit, the combination resorted to by these five companies. Singly, each might have suspended deliveries and sales of coal to suit its own interests, and might have suspended deliveries and sales of coal to suit its own interests, and might have suspended deliveries and sales of coal to suit its own interests, and might have raised the price, even though this might have been detrimental to the public interest. There is a certain freedom which must be allowed to every one in the management of his own affairs. When competition is left free, individual error or folly will generally find a correction in the conduct of others. But here is a combination of all the companies operating in the Blossburg and Burday mining regions, and controlling their entire productions.

They have combined together to govern the supply and the price of coal in all the markets from the Hudson to the Mississippi Rivers, and from Pennsylvania to the lakes. This combination has a power in its confederated form which no individual action can supply. The public interest must succumb to it, for it has left no competition free to correct its haleful influence. When the supply of coal is suspended the demand for it becomes important and prices must rise; or, if the price goes forward, the price fixed by the confederates must accompany it. The domestic hearth, the furnaces of the iron-master, and fires of the manufacturer all feel the restraint, while many dependent hands are paralyzed and hungry mouths are stinted. The influence of a lack of supply or the rise in the price of an article of such supreme necessity can not be measured. It permeates the entire mass of the community and leaves few of its members untouched by its withering blight. Such a combination is more than a contract; it is an offense.

And in direct connection with this subject of railroad pools I desire to read a brief extract from the able argument made before the House. Committee on Commerce by Mr. Chittenden, of New York, which sets forth with startling effect the immense and dangerous power of these great railroad confederations:

This pool commenced in 1877; it was then a pool contract between the four trunk lines centering in New York. It has grown and stretched out its arms and increased, just as an English judge said such contracts would grow and increase, until now it embraces certainly more than forty—that was the last enumeration I had—of the principal railroads of this country. There is in New York city an equipped and organized pool government. It has its executive committee of the pool, and another executive committee composed of one member from each pooling railroad; it has its board of arbitration, which is intended to take the place of the judiciary; it has its corps of—I do not know how many hundred—clerks, an enormous concern, and over it all is the emperor, the commissioner, Mr. Fink, who to-day exercises a power for good or evil over the commerce and products of this country greater not only than that of any of his contemporaries, but greater than any man ever before exerted in the United States of America. He and his imperial organization are as independent of the law as it is possible for man or State to be, and the whole charter or contract which binds these forty roads into this one copartnership and confederation, judged by the principles of the common law, is as unlawful and as much against public policy, if we are to accept the declarations of the judges of the common law, as the Louisiana State Lottery or any other similar institution which is confessedly without the pale of the common law.

I do not wish to appear, Mr. Speaker, as opposing wealthy corporate

I do not wish to appear, Mr. Speaker, as opposing wealthy corporate interests, whether it be railroads, telegraphs, banks, manufactures, or what not, merely because they are corporations—far from it; but I shall oppose them now, as I have always done in the past, whenever they become oppressive monopolists. I do not desire to appear as warring become oppressive monopolists. I do not desire to appear as warring against any man individually because he chooses to invest his means in railroad or other corporations. Many worthy citizens are largely so interested. Capital always seeks the best obtainable investment by the natural laws of business, and no man is to be blamed for honestly investing his means in any legitimate business that pays him best. The railroad owner, the protected manufacturer, the banker, or whoever he may be, is not to be blamed because he has taken legitimate advantage of the partial legislation which, under Republican rule in the past, has been enacted to his benefit. The highly protected manufacturer, with a practical monopoly of his business, is not going to sell his goods for one dollar, even though that yields him a fair profit, where especial privileges enable him to successfully demand two dollars. A man may honestly avail himself of the advantages in business given him by the law, and at the same time recognize the injustice of that law. The evil in these cases is not so much with the individual benefited by the law as with the law itself and the recognized the injustice of the law is the law i with the law itself and the people's representatives who make the law.

As for myself, in my course upon this floor, I have always endeavored to faithfully carry out the pledge I made to my constituents in my speech of acceptance, when unanimously nominated for Congress by the Democracy of the seventh Congressional district of Indiana. In referring to what my course would be if elected to Congress, I used these words:

When questions arise with the interests of grasping corporations or privileged classes on the one hand and the people on the other, you will find me on the side of the people every time. This was my platform as your representative in the last Indiana house of representatives, and this shall be my platform as your representative in the next United States House of Representatives.

And in view of that pledge I challenge the production of one vote of mine here that has not been in accord with it, or that was not right and just and for the best interests of my constituents. And in this connection I have been glad at every opportunity to vote to forfeit the outrageous land grants heretofore improperly made to these rapacious railroad corporations. I shall ever advocate the return of these millions of acres to the public domain, where they rightfully belong, and I was pleased to vote at the last session for the bill to amend the pre-emption laws with the amendment of my colleague Judge Holman, providing that the public lands shall be henceforth reserved for actual settlers only. I had the honor also to vote last session for a bill which I still hope to see become the law—the bill to amend the Pacific Railroad act, and compel that giant corporation to pay over to the Government that which of right belongs to it. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to let the light of day shine upon any vote that I have recorded here. I have ever been present in my seat voting upon all important measures, and I have always voted against increased expenditures and increased appropriations, and have I have opposed the river and harbor bill and the educational bill, both of which in my opinion take millions upon millions of dollars from the Treasury without justification. I have supported every proposition here to better the condition of the laboring classes. I favored the bill to establish a bureau of labor statistics, and the bill to prevent the im-portation of foreign-contract labor into the country, as well as the bill to secure to working men the benefits of the eight-hour law, which has in many instances been persistently violated by Government officials. I have voted for all propositions to pension the Union soldier and his family, or to increase their pensions, and have voted at every opportunity to take up and pass the Mexican pension bill, with every amendment thereto in behalf of the Union soldier and his widow and children. These votes I know are approved by my constituents regardless of party And that those who sent me here do not feel that I have violated the pledge I gave them when nominated, and that my course in Congress meets with their approbation, it is only necessary to call attention to the resolution of indorsement which was unanimously adopted at the last Democratic Congressional convention held in my district, and before which for personal and business reasons I declined to be a candidate for renomination. It was as follows:

Resolved. That we cordially approve of the action of the House of Representatives of the United States in placing Hon. WILL. E. ENGLISH in the seat of that body to which he was fairly elected in 1882. We hear with regret his wish and determination not to be a candidate for re-election, and we unqualifiedly express our confidence in him as a faithful representative.

> That my vote in favor of this bill will meet with equal approbation That my vote in tavor of this bill will meet with equal approbation at their hands I do not for a moment doubt. Mr. Speaker, that the Reagan bill has its defects is not unlikely, but in my humble judgment it is far preferable to the bill proposed by the committee. It creates no new offices, it establishes no commissions, but goes about correcting the evils from which the people are asking relief in a straightforward and business-like manner. Its intentions are plain, its methods are direct and simple. I believe it to be fair and just to the railroads and fair and just to the public. Did I not so believe it to be equally just to both I should not give it my support. But feeling that it is for just to both I should not give it my support. But feeling that it is for the best interests of the whole people, I with pleasure record my vote in favor of the passage of the bill.

Pensions.

SPEECH

HON. WILLIAM E. ENGLISH,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, December 10, 1884,

On the bill (H. R. 3947) granting a pension to Joseph Raible.

Mr. ENGLISH said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The soldier who applies for this relief is one of my constituents and is a respected citizen of Indianapolis, where I reside. And in this connection I desire to say to my esteemed friend from Virginia [Mr. George D. Wise] that in his speech against this bill at the session of last Friday night he unintentionally misrepresented my colsession of last Friday light he differentiationary insrepresented by colleague from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. MATSON]. This applicant has never resided in my colleague's district, and he has no personal acquaintance with him or special interest in his success. Nor have I any personal interest in this bill other than that the right shall prevail.

This bill was originally introduced by my predecessor on this floor, and this applicant is not my political follower, but is an ardent opponent of the party to which I belong, and was equally ardent in his opposition to my election to Congress. But I do not allow political preferences to stand in the way when a gallant soldier's pension is to be considered. I am first, last, and all the time in favor of granting the fullest pension to every descriping soldier. I have so yoted at every fullest pension to every deserving soldier. I have so voted at every opportunity, and shall continue so to do. I only know in this case that this claimant was a gallant soldier in the hour that tried men's souls. I only know that he willingly responded to his country's call and was ever in the forefront of the battle in her behalf. I only know that he gave three of the best years of his life to her defense, and that he left home, family, and friends to undergo hardship and privation that the

I know his reputation to be that of a good citizen in peace and a gal-lant soldier in war, and I shall not split hairs as to the exact hour that he gave up his good right arm as a monument of his service to his country. care not whether it was a few days before or a few days after, he w formally mustered out of the United States service. Sufficient that this formally mustered out of the United States service. Sufficient that this disability was in fact the result of his service in the Army, and was received in the line of duty while fulfilling the commands of his superior officers, and while he was still practically (whether technically or not) in the Government service. I shall not look for far-fetched technicalities by which to avoid pensioning this gallant defender of the Union, but shall rather seek to find them in his behalf. I know his helpless condition, I know his earnest need, I know that he is deserving of his country's helping hand, and I know, Mr. Speaker, that this bill in justice ought to pass. And I sincerely trust that the objections urged by my friend from Virginia [Mr. George D. Wiss] will not prevail against this measure of justice to a needy and worthy soldier. And, Mr. Speaker, I further hope that it will not be long until this House renders justice to every such crippled soldier in the land who is in need of Govjustice to every such crippled soldier in the land who is in need of Government aid.

I believe that we should be especially liberal with these maimed veterans who have suffered the loss of an arm or leg, and in some instances the terrible loss of both an arm and a leg. These poor disabled sufferers, undergoing a fate in many instances worse than death, must know great deprivation and want unless the Government is more liberal to them in the future than it has been in the past. The pensions now granted those suffering under this grade of disability, in my opinion, is manifestly too small. Let us not be niggardly with the one-armed and one-legged heroes who are still left with us. Sometime since I had the honor to introduce a bill in this House upon this subject which I still hope to see become the law (H. R. 7772). It provides that those who have lost an arm or a leg shall be given a pension of $50 per month, and those who lost both an arm and a leg shall be given

I understand that this is a larger pension than has ever been previously proposed for this class of pensioners, and I know that it has been intimated that I am disposed to be a little too liberal in this matter, but I prefer to err on the side of liberality in this regard rather than run the risk of doing too little. And in this bill now before us I believe the amount allowed ought in justice to this claimant to be increased to $50 a month. It is the duty of the Government to extend every possible aid to these crippled and maimed veterans, left helpless and dependent as a result of their sacrifices for the perpetuity of the Union. They are the nation's wards, deserving of every care, and should never be allowed to know want or penury. And, Mr. Speaker, I hold that this course should be pursued by the Government to all its dependent defenders who have become disabled from any cause whatsoever which is not the result of their own gross carelessness or wrongdoing. holding these views, I have voted at every stage of our proceedings to take up and pass the Mexican pension bill, together with all the amendments thereto in the interest of the Union soldier and his widow and children.

I am glad of the opportunity to vote for the pensioning of both the Mexican and the Union soldier. They both deserve it, and it should be promptly and cheerfully granted them, and I most cordially approve the Senate amendments which increase the pensions of the widows and minor children of the Union soldier from $8 to $12, and which provide that the widows and minor children of the pensioned soldier shall be entitled to a pension without being required to show that his shall be entitled to a pension without being required to show that his death was actually due to his service in the Army. However, in this short digression from my argument in behalf of my disabled constituent, I shall not beable, in the short time allowed me, to take up all these amendments in behalf of the Union soldier and fully discuss them, but they are all in the line of justice and right, and I shall content myself with merely incorporating them here without further comment other than to say that I warmly approve them all. They are as follows:

than to say that I warmly approve them all. They are as follows:

(15) Sec. 8. That every person specified in the several classes enumerated in section 4693 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the amendments thereto, who served in the military or naval service, as mentioned in said section, for the period of three months during the war of the rebellion, and has an honorable discharge therefrom, and who is or shall become disabled from any cause not the result of his own gross carelessness, disreputable conduct, or vicious habits, and shall also be dependent upon his own labor for support, shall, upon making due proof of the facts, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the proper authority, be placed upon the list of pensioners of the United States, and be entitled to receive a pension during the continuance of such disability at a rate proportionate to the degree thereof; and such pension shall commence at the date of filing an application therefor. The highest rate of pension granted under this section, which shall be for total incapacity to perform any manual labor, shall be $24, which is hereby made divisible upon that basis for any less degree of disability: Provided, That no person entitled to or receiving an invalid pension under existing laws, or such as may be hereafter enacted, granting pensions for disabilities contracted in the military or naval service of the United States, and in line of duty, greater than that provided for herein, shall receive the benefits of this act; but any applicant for such invalid pension having an application therefor pending, or who shall hereafter file his application for such pension, may, by a declaration over his own signature, at any time, elect to prosecute his said claim under this act or under the general laws, and his pension, when allowed, if prosecuted under this act, shall commence from the date of such election.

(16) Sec. 9. That all widows or minor children of soldiers and sailors who as such are now receiving, under existing laws, ge

(17) Sec. 10. That if any invalid pensioner pensioned for a disability contracted in the military or naval service of the United States, and in the line of duty, has died or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow or minor child under 16 years of age, or both, at the date of the death of such pensioner, such widow and minor children shall be entitled, in the order of succession named, to an original pension in their own right, under existing laws, without being required to prove that the death of such pensioner was due to his military or naval service of the United States, and shall receive the rates now allowed by law, except that such as may be found to be entitled to $$ per month under existing laws shall receive in lieu thereof $12 per month.

(18) Sec. 11. That pensions granted widows on account of minor children shall be continued without limit as to age, whenever it shall appear that such minors are of unsound mind or physically helpless, so as to render them incapable of earning a subsistence: Provided, That such widow retains the care, custody, and control of such minors; and in the event of the death or remarriage of such widow, or abandonment by her of such minors, then the pension and additional pension shall be continued to them in their own right, without limit as to age, during the continuance of such disability, payable to a duly constituted guardian.

(19) Sec. 12. That in considering the claims of dependent parents the fact and cause of death and the fact that the soldier left no widow or minor children having been shown as required by law, it shall be necessary only to show by competent and sufficient evidence that such dependent parent is without other present means of comfortable support than his or her support; and such as may be found to be entitled to $8 a month under existing laws shall receive in lieu thereof $12 a month from the date of this act.

Post-Office Appropriation Bill.

SPEECH

HON. JONATHAN H. ROWELL,

OF ILLINOIS.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 13, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 8138) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

Mr. Chairman: The constantly recurring discussion over the alleged extravagant prices paid to railway companies for carrying the mails has led the Committee on Appropriations to present upon this appropriation bill an amendment to the existing law in the shape of a new scheme by which to regulate the compensation for this service. I propose for a few minutes to address myself to a comparison of the merits and demerits of the present and the proposed law

Of the present method of determining the prices to be paid for this service it can be fairly asserted that it has the merit of certainty; that there is very little latitude for discrimination or favoritism on the part of the Post-Office authorities—very little discretion as to whether the smount paid shall be greater or less than a certain fixed amount for similar quantities of mail carried. It has no maximums and minimums between which the Postmaster-General may select at pleasure, and consequently offers no inducement for interested parties to seek improperly to influence the judgment of that officer.

It will do no hurt to restate the method of determining this compensation under existing law for the purpose of the comparison I propose to make, although I may not be able to present it as concisely as has the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR].

In the first place, the average daily weight of mail matter going over each of the various mail-routes is ascertained by actual weighing for a sufficient number of consecutive days to fix the average, and that average is the weight to be paid for for the succeeding four years, although we know by actual experience that this is an ever-increasing quantity, and in consequence we pay on a less number of pounds than is actually

On a daily average weight of from twenty-five to two hundred pounds carried we pay $50 per mile per year for each mile of road. This amount diminishes by 10 per cent. and the remainder by 5 per cent. From two hundred to five thousand pounds the amount is gradually increased, under fixed rules, until it reaches $200 per mile, diminished by 10 and 5 per cent. as before. Above five thousand pounds the additional compensation is $1 for each eighty pounds, subject to the same per cent. of diminution. When the amount transported, not being classed mail, is sufficient to require one or more entire cars for its proper handling and distribution, an additional sum of from $25 to $55, owing to length, is allowed for each car so used.

The only discretion allowed in this whole business is in the determination of the number and length of cars required; and this is a very limited discretion, not easily susceptible of abuse. I do not discuss special fast-mail facilities, because these are determined by Congress in the annual appropriation bills and not by general law. In fixing compensation neither speed nor frequency of trips enter into the calculation, but a failure to make a trip as provided in the schedule sub-jects the railway company to fines and penalties proportioned to the failure and the amount allowed.

The railway companies on their part are required to transport the mails on passenger trains, to furnish apartments in express or baggage cars, fully equipped and of sufficient size to accommodate the postal clerk in his work, and transport the clerk without additional charge, subject to the additional pay for entire postal cars, as before stated. They are also required to receive and deliver the mail at all postoffices not more than eighty rods from their stations, without limit as to number—from all of which it certainly appears that we may always determine with mathematical accuracy the amount of money required annually for this service, subject to be diminished by fines and penalties and to be increased by the establishment of new routes

The new scheme presented by the Committee on Appropriations goes upon an entirely different theory. It is a departure from all usual methods of ascertaining what is reasonable pay for all kinds of carrying business, and for that reason, if for no other, it should be examined with due caution. On the other hand it comes to us with the approval of a commission appointed to examine into this very matter, with the approval of the Post-Office Committee, and finally with the express sanction of the Committee on Appropriations—weighty reasons why we should not lightly reject it.

The elements which enter into this new method of ascertaining reasonable compensation are space occupied, approximately determined by weight, frequency of trips, and speed. It is assumed as an excuse for increased pay for increased speed and for increased trips that increased speed makes additional cost, and that it is reasonable to pay for each trip made although weight must necessarily be lessened to the trip.

The trouble with the theory is it includes the necessary assumption that railroads are built and operated primarily for the purpose of carrying the mail, and ignores every other incident of failway traffic, whereas in fact mail carrying is but an incident. The trains upon which the mails are transported being primarily run for passenger traffic, their speed and frequency are regulated by the demands of this business, so that ordinarily these elements do not affect the cost of carriage and ought not to be taken into consideration. Indeed, roads which transport very large mails, requiring three or four entire cars, are accommodated by being permitted to take one car with each passenger train instead of being required to take all the cars with one train, and thereby injure its usefulness for passenger business. On the other hand, the roads which do not require entire cars, by reason of the light mail, and where apartments in express or baggage cars are used as distributing offices, usually only utilize the surplus space in cars that must go with their trains, and it is of but slight consequence whether such apartments are used on one or on all of the passenger trains. I do not deny that there will be some increase of trouble and expense; my claim is that this additional expense is small and out of all proportion to the pro-

Now, let us examine the results of the proposed scheme. In the illustrations brought before the committee by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] comparisons were made between the present control of the property of the present control of the present the cost by the proposed method on the assumption that the trains would continue to be run at the same speed as now, and that the space now used would continue to be occupied under the new system, not exceeding the maximum allowed, and that there would be no change in the

I invite the attention of the House to a different kind of comparisons. Instead of making comparisons on the basis of present frequency, space, and speed, I call your attention to the permissible rates provided for in this bill in contrast with present rates. Taking the maximum space allowed on roads making six trips per week at a speed not exceeding twenty miles per hour, those roads which now receive $42.75 per mile per year, and from that up to any sum less than $64.12½, would receive $40.69 per mile. From a present compensation of $64.12½ to any sum the new pay would be $78.25. From $128.65 to $149.25 the change would be to $125.20. A present compensation of $181 would change to $140.85.

It will be noticed that all these smaller roads will have their compensation greatly decreased under this new method, taking the maximum space permitted, if there is no change in the number and speed of the trips-that great inequality is permitted, some suffering a small and others, as weight increases, a large deduction, and that the pay may, in the discretion of the Post-Office authorities, go much below the figures given. But the proposed act authorizes the Postmaster-General to cause the mails to be carried on two or more trains per day.

Now, notice the change that may take place under this authority. Roads now receiving $42.75 by making twelve trips per week may receive $81.38 per mile, or by making fourteen trips per week (two trains per day, including Sunday), $94.90 per mile. Roads now receiving $149.25 per mile, by doubling the trips may receive $203.45, or by insundays, so as to make fourteen trips, $237.25. Roads now receiving $181 by doubling the trips may receive $250.40, or by including Sundays, $292. And all this possible increase is made without any enhancement of speed, and on a majority of roads by simply utilizing the passenger trains now run and the surplus space in their express or baggage cars, and this too, as I have said before, without any consideration of the surplus space in the surplus space of the state of the said before, without any consideration of the said before the sai able increase of cost to the roads. The great trunk-lines, where trips are more frequent, are secured by the bill like possibilities of greatly increased compensation over present rates; but owing to the fact that they are now paid extra for entire cars used, the possible increase per mile is not quite so extraordinary, except where the number of trips is largely increased.

Still another method of largely increasing the pay above the figures given on all the roads running their trains more than twenty miles per hour is afforded by the provision requiring the additional payment of one-tenth of a mile per linear foot of space used for every two miles of speed over twenty miles per hour; a poor gratuity, having none of the elements of reasonableness, because, as I have before stated, speed ordinarily is regulated by the demands of passenger business, and not by the requirements of the meal service.

It thus appears that instead of the present certain and unvarying compensation we have here an uncertain, varying rate, extremes well spart, between which to choose; an opportunity for the exercise of sound judgment, I grant you, but a like opportunity for erroneous judgment, caprice, interested pressure, influences which in recent times have brought discredit upon the Post-Office Department and upon the nation. It offers inducements to every railroad company in the land to bring a pressure to bear upon the Post-Office authorities to expedite the mails, to work up a public sentiment along the various routes in the same interest, and thus make it a matter of personal concern to every member of Congress. On the other hand it gives to the Postmaster-General extraordinary power, power to hold over the heads of all railroad authorities the constant danger of diminished pay, and so secure subserviency through fear; power to bind them to him and his political fortunes through discriminating favors without violating a line or letter of the law, but in strict accordance with it; power to diminish or increase the sum annually paid for transporting the mails, by several millions of dollars, and no law or authority anywhere to prevent. Congress will be slow to vest such power in any officer.

The Democratic party can not afford to signalize its return to administrative control by taking so large a risk, considering its surroundings and the temptations which beset its pathway. It does not follow that no changes are necessary or desirable in the present method of compensating the roads for this service.

I have tried to point out the dangers lurking in this new scheme, and I may be permitted to suggest one or two reforms that ought to be made. The closed mails carried in sealed cars on the great trunk-lines ought to be weighed separately from the mail carried in distributing-cars, and the pay for such carriage diminished. This is entirely practicable, and it seems to me reasonable. Instead of equal pay for all weight over 5,000 pounds when carried in post-office ears, considering that the use of the cars is paid for, there ought to be a decreasing scale for increased weight, with a fixed limit, to bring this service within the bounds of weight, with a fixed limit, to bring this service within the bounds of reasonableness and into harmony with other carrying business. A fixed rule regulating the length and number of entire cars to be paid for seems to me to be desirable. With these amendments to existing law we would have certainly reasonableness and correct business principles. I invoke a candid consideration of these suggestions, and congratulate the House and the country on our escape, through the effectual instrumentality of a "point of order," from the dangers lurking in this new scheme—a scheme of possible, and therefore probable, plunder so long as our overfull Treasury remains a temptation to scheming and long as our overfull Treasury remains a temptation to scheming and unscrupulous men.

Rivers and Harbors.

SPEECH

HON. JOHN W. McCORMICK. OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 13, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCORMICK said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The necessity of an appropriation of money from time to time for the improvement of rivers and harbors has long since become apparent to all persons interested in the business affairs and prosperity of the country.

The question is one that has long since engaged the attention of leading minds in regard to public affairs, and to oppose a justand economic application of money to the end in view would be to ignore the progress and logic of events. While honest differences of opinion may exist as to the amount of money required and the means by which it is to be applied, we must all agree as to the necessity of liberal appropriations in the interest of commerce and the cheap transportation of our native products.

It is a matter to be regretted in the discussion of so important a question as that of rivers and harbors, in which the interests of the whole people are involved, that a spirit of sectionalism or partisanship should have any controlling influence in those discussions, or that any special localities under such an influence be favored in any selfish spirit to the exclusion of others equally important and meritorious. The only beneficial result possible to be achieved by discussion from a sectional or partisan standpoint would be to elicit information as to the propriety of the application of money for those improvements which might the more the application of money for those improvements which might the more properly and unselfishly come from other more dignified sources.

While it would undoubtedly be fair and just that well-considered and matured plans for the accomplishment in a proper order of succession, by reasonable appropriations, of those improvements which are most important, we should at the same time seek to avoid all lavish expenditures without due consideration and the well-established persuasion of their merit, based on proper information, suggested by the highest engineering skill and experience of the country. We can not afford to apply any haphazard methods here.

Our system of harbors and water ways is indeed a vast one, and with-out caution and care it is possible to sink countless sums of money in attempted schemes of improvement, however honestly intended, that may in the end prove utter failures.

In my judgment, that caution and care are highly essential in the conothers I would specially name the proposed Hennepin Canal project, the Galveston Harbor improvement, as well as some of the methods suggested for the improvement of the lower Mississippi River.

It is not for me to say what methods for these improvements are best; neither does it remain for me to say they are not of absolute necessity; but it will be conceded by every man on this floor that we should be informed to the fullest extent of inquiry and investigation of their practicability, and that the methods suggested for these improvements are likely to prove successful.

In my humble opinion, we have not yet obtained that very desirable information in the consideration of this bill.

The American people will not be disposed to complain at anything well done for the country to promote and advance the interests of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, when they are assured that these interests of so great importance are being economically and properly managed.

If so persuaded, a sense of national honor and pride will be stimulated, that while millions upon millions of money are being expended in a well-devised system of internal improvements it is for the employment a well-devised system of internal improvements it is for the employment of labor, the creation of a diversity of industries, and for the convenience, safety, comfort, and welfare of the people, as well as of all the material and social interests of the country.

Such improvements would unite all portions of the country and bind

Such improvements would unite all portions of the country and bind and harmonize all sections and all classes as with bands of steel, and thus contribute greatly to make us the most wealthy, prosperous, and happy nation on the face of the globe. The natural facilities and resources of the country are already inviting thus the resources of wealth and genius, skill and energy to accomplish so desirable an end. As we look at the map of the United States, and trace our vast line of seacoast—the Atlantic on the east, the Pacific on the west, the great inland seas on the north, and the Gulf on the south—we become at once impressed with the magnitude of the work before us. Truly, in the language of Sacred Writ, "Deep calleth unto deep;" but the marriage of these can only be accomplished by a system of railroads and by the improvement of our vast natural inland facilities of water ways. These become the great arteries of communication and interstate commerce, whose competition must of necessity cheapen rates of freight and travel whose competition must of necessity cheapen rates of freight and travel and thus prevent extortion.

The general course of our vast river system is from north to south, while that of our leading railroads is from east to west, and, as if or-dered by Divine power for their highest good, they are thus naturally adapted to form our strongest bond of union and fellowship, based as they are on social and commercial interests rather than upon franchises, constitutions, and compacts.

The Congress of the United States has indeed a work of great magnitude before it in just such improvements of our rivers and harbors as will most fully secure the best facilities for the interchange of the products of the soil for those of the manufacturer and for the closest possible communication between all portions of the country for the welfare and happiness and the business prosperity of the whole people. Our resources, energy, thrift, and enterprise are such that no man who has a sense of national pride will for a moment admit that our progress shall be interrupted by shoals, quicksands, or snags from reaping the full advantage of our great natural facilities.

To my mind far more consideration should be given to the improvements suggested to secure such a result, and less to the disturbance of our revenue and protective system, the agitation of which is always more or less fraught with disaster to the manufacturing interest of the country and the employment of labor and wages. We need no foreign dictation in the development of our own resources. We need not be told by any foreign power what we ought to be, or what we ought to do; but self-respect and a proper regard for national prestige, safety, and honor would suggest to us the necessity and importance of an efficient protective system, merchant marine, and navy, and last, but not least

Hasty, spasmodic efforts, or ill-considered and poorly applied appropriations of money are not in order here, but on the contrary wise statesmanship and engineering skill combined in a just comprehension of the nature of the work to be performed should characterize every effort made to secure the end in view. The American people, above all others, are disposed to think for themselves, and to become the powerful practical exponents of that thought in their political action. We trust such thought may be stimulated and such knowledge be diffused among all classes of citizens on this and all other economic questions of national import, so as to place them forever above sectionalism and partisanship and beyond the control of the political demagogue. The highest interests of statesmanship, the advancement of the industrial, commercial, and social welfare, the prosperity and happiness of all the people, demand it.

Rivers and Harbors.

HON. CLIFTON R. BRECKINRIDGE.

OF ARKANSAS.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 3, 1885.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and naving under consideration the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes—

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: When the river and harbor bill was reported to the House I gave notice of my intention to bring in a minority report. have been unable to write out that report; but in the course of my remarks I will bring before the House the propositions it would con-rain. I did not contemplate a dissent from anything in the bill reported by the committee, but an addition to the bill.

The committee made no appropriations for harbors upon the Mississippi River below Cairo. They made a proportionable appropriation for the river below Cairo as a unit; but they left out those additional recommendations of the commission for the respective harbors to which

It is of the utmost importance to the people of this country, and especially to those north of Cairo, that the unity of the plan of treating the river should not be interfered with. This is enforced from every source. If the appropriations are broken up into disconnected parts it destroys all continuous and contiguous treatment of the river. This, I say, can not be permitted by the great States north, east, or west of Cairo. The House knows very well that the river below Cairo is not being improved for the benefit of the sparse population upon its banks, but for the benefit of the whole Mississippi Valley, of which the lower part is the least part. There are, however, certain cities of commercial importance situated upon the banks of the lower river, and it can not be expected that the commercial interests centering at these points will be wholly unmindful of their own necessities and rights.

But the proposition has been brought forward that these ports are not harbors in the usual and commercial sense. This can never be agreed to. Over against it I lay the maintained policy of Congress in cases almost without number. The position of the committee is illogical,

It was only last year that an appropriation was made for the Missouri River as a river. Before that the appropriations were for the improvement exclusively of the harbors upon that river; and all along the line of Congressional action we have these appropriations for the interior

I consider, sir, that a harbor like that at the city of Memphis has a stronger claim upon Congress for attention than even those upon our seaboard. For instance, take the harbor at New York. The improvements there enter in no wise into the general plan of improvement to connect the Atlantic Ocean with Albany, while, on the contrary, an appropriation for the improvement of these harbors upon the Mississippi River-and I cite again the Memphis Harbor-are appropriations for improvements that will in all human probability in due time be links in the general system of the river improvement. There is not a dollar expended nor a lick of work done that is not expended and done where only general river improvement is carried on. It all would be done here in time anyway. The only question is, shall we do it a little quicker than we would in the ordinary course of events? And yet in the face of a settled question and in the face of this peculiar strength gentlemen hesitate. And why?

They say that in due time the general river improvement will cover This is true; but this is selfish in our Northern friends to make us wait and suffer until we are relieved only as a tardy incident to their relief.

They say that such improvements would benefit private property. That is true; but if that is an unavoidable incident in the discharge of our bounden duty, should it grieve us? Why should that confuse our I know the doctrine of riparian rights and risks. But there is another question in this case. This is not a river landing, where a planter hauls cotton from his gin-house a few hours before the steamboat is due. This is the city to which he ships. This is the city to which he not only ships, but also to which hundreds of thousands of other people in the interior and among the uplands and mountains ship their produce, and from which they get their merchandise and manufactured goods of all kinds.

Here are the railroad centers. Here are the warehouses, the cotton compresses, the paved wharfs, the railroad inclines, and all the other needs and appurtenances of commerce. If these are destroyed the peo-ple who own them are losers. There is no doubt about that. But is no one else a loser? Is commerce not affected by the broad funda-mental fact that it can no longer have a port here? It must either stand in its charges the expense of these risks or else it must go by rail to distant ports where stability is found, and of course that makes an equal charge upon the commerce. This may suit the railroads, but it will not pay the farmers and merchants. Who can gainsay this?

It is questionable whether Congress would sit still and see a city like Memphis, the second city of the South—for Louisville is hardly Southern—plunge headlong into the Mississippi River and be lost forever. As a case of prepay and distress the American heart would respond to

As a case of urgency and distress the American heart would respond to it. Who would say no? We would curb the great river that we only have charge of and save the happy homes of 75,000 people.

But we do not need to go to this. This is not like a plantation landing. The landing may be swept away and the planter would want only a landing still. The untouched river bank is all he wants. But here are certain great centers, scattered over a thousand miles of river, and commerce must find stability there for its assembled needs, or else the thousands must pay tribute to less fortuitous conditions. The river is but little to these people if they can not do business upon its banks. I appeal to you then, gentlemen from the North, not to see only your own interests, not to disregard these righteous claims, and not to provoke a desperate struggle between yourselves and the commercial interests of the lower States.

And now there are two other points that I want to speak about as briefly as I can. In the first place I wish to speak of a few engineering features in connection with the Galveston Harbor improvement. As is known by this House we propose to throw overboard work there that has cost nearly $2,000,000, or at least what little is left of it, and to change the entire management of the work at that place. This is a very grave reflection upon the military engineers who have charge of this work, and there must be very grave reasons for so radical a step. I am one of those who believe that reasons exist not only sufficient to justify the proposed step but sufficient to make it absolutely obligatory upon us.

The Government work was begun there ten years ago. The survey and plans are given in the report of 1874. At an expenditure of several hundred thousand dollars a jetty of gabions was extended from what is known as Bolivar Point into the Gulf. General Newton figures it out in his letter to our committee that this gabionnade cost $169,000. Senator COKE, in the very able report he made to the Senate on behalf of the Commerce Committee of that body, figures the cost at $527,000. It is not easy from the Engineer's reports to fix the exact amount; but I have figured it up twice, and it is certain, if the reports be correct, that General Newton is far too low, and I am very much inclined to think that Senator COKE is too low.

It was expected, as you will see on page 867 of report of 1875 and on page 447 of report of 1877, that this north jetty would secure the desired depth of water there. However, nature has rebuked the dis-regard of her laws and the gabionnade is gone. There is not a vestige of the structure left. This was not due to quicksand or to any such cause. The gabions were no account to begin with, and had they been strong they would have been lost just the same. They exemplified what is known as the surmerged jetty, a novel species of structure that we are largely engaged in and with apparently no earthly sign of stability

I have taken occasion, sir, to read the accounts of all the sea works in the world on the jetty plan that I could find, and I have a long list of them, and never was there any work of that kind undertaken, nor, indeed, was it ever suggested that I have been able to learn except once. The single suggestion that I speak of was in the course of the consultations of engineers and others with reference to the improvement of the mouth of the Danube. Sir Charles Hartley, the engineer in charge, stated that the plan of submerged jetties was "actually proposed to the commission by one of its technical advisers." It permitted the very force you propose to conserve to be dispersed and lost, for your only hope of power is in controlling the surface slope, which controls the currents at all depths, and they would serve no other purpose than that of "dangerous submarine reefs."

I respectfully refer those who may not have read the interesting paper I quote from to page 287, volume 21, Proceedings Institution Civil Engineers, London, to be found in the national Library.

That plan was adopted at Galveston by what is known as the gabionnade system. What is a gabion? A gabion is nothing but a huge lunch basket that is cemented on the outside as you cement the inside of a cistern, and that basket is filled with sand, is put in position, and was supposed to be irresistible to storms. These gabions did resist the storms, so far as being broken up is concerned, much better than they resisted some of the other effects of the storms and the effects of tidal currents. Being submerged, and the tides and waves sweeping over them with a dangerous overfall current, they were undermined. Footmats did not save them. The conclusion is well stated in the report of 1880, page 1226, where it says: "In fact, the gabionnade has essentially gone down below the original bottom."

And so they are gone, and that folly has not even its monument left. That would seem to have demonstrated the futility of putting down submerged jetties, for this submerged jetty was not undermined because it had the name of "gabionnade." No other name would have saved it.

In 1880 a new method of construction was adopted. Captain Howell was replaced with Major Mansfield, the present officer in charge. What is known as the fascine system, a partial copy of the Dutch works at the mouth of the Maas, was adopted. But the copy is like "Hamlet with Hamlet left out." The Dutch works are high. These are to be submerged. The Maas has silt to protect the fascines. These have no hope of mud to protect them from the teredo, a most destructive sea-worm. And as for gathering sand, our last submerged jetty did not collect sand, as expected. It was left "standing in a trench without sand." How can this fare better when it is substantially the same shape and height? They seem to be repeating in principle, though in a little different form, the same error that was committed before.

Over $1,000,000 has been put out on this new work, and the people of Texas continued to pin their hope to the plan. That has gone on, sir, until it has been projected now some four and a quarter miles into the Gulf. All the prophecies with reference to it have failed.

the Gulf. All the prophecies with reference to it have failed.

There were plenty of prophecies of what would be the result of the present jetty at the different stages of its progress—prophecies of depth, of durability, and all that. I will treat of these more particularly later on. The people of Galveston put $100,000 of their own money into the work. But after severe disappointments and about nine years of trial they threw up the case, and last session the entire delegation from Texas, a delegation conspicuous for its ability and high character, told us frankly that further work upon this system was in their opinion a waste of time and money.

Now the question is, have we enough to satisfy us? But we must go further in our examination of the work and of the men who have control of it. This will help us to come to a right conclusion as to whether one or both should be put aside. Judging as laymen, we must be largely influenced by our confidence in the men. I will call attention to some of the statements of the engineers.

You will find, sir, in the printed remarks of my colleague on the committee, General BAYNE, of Pennsylvania, a letter from Colonel Merrill, an officer of the military Engineer Corps and who seems now to be a spokesman in this matter.

Colonel Merrill states that both the Chief of Engineers and the resident engineer deny that the north jetty has yet been located.

Now, in reference to that I want to call the attention of the House to page 1225 of the report of the Chief of Engineers for 1880. It reads: From its commencement, April 14, 1877, to January 1, 1880, the Bolivar pier—had been extended seaward from the beach 10,220 feet.

Now that statement is signed by General Newton himself, the present Chief of Engineers, who is quoted by Colonel Merrill as denying that this jetty has ever been located.

I can not comprehend, Mr. Chairman, how about two miles of this north jetty could be built, running through nearly three years, without having been located; nor can I understand how such a statement as has been presented to us can be thus solemnly certified to Congress for its guidance. Was anybody cashiered or complained of for that immense expenditure of the public funds in an unauthorized way? No, sir; and there was no occasion to do it, for it was on an accepted line. I have quoted from the last report of the board of engineers, and if you will look at their first report, in 1874, you will see that they therein make revised estimates for both the north and south jetty projected toward the outer bar, and they raise Captain Howell's estimate $635, 401.50, making the total $1,759,401.85, instead of $1,124,000.35. The chart is referred to as showing the "parallel jetties," and the board takes no exception to that location, nor does it suggest any change. This report also is signed by General Newton himself. It is in the face of these facts and of many more like them, running all through the reports, that "both the Chief of Engineers and the engineer in charge deny that the north jetty has ever been located."

I will call attention to one other proof. Here is the chart with the report of 1880. It is the official map of the engineer in charge, Colonel Mansfield, with his signature upon it, and it is under these words: "Showing lines of proposed jetties." This chart is sent to Congress by the then Chief of Engineers, and it is in Colonel Mansfield's report, dated July 17, 1880, just thirty-seven days after the report of the board, of which General Newton was a member, and which gave advice to the Engineering Department to help it to a final conclusion. After it has been all digested we have this map, which the Chief of Engineers publishes with his report and without comment. Yet the north jetty is not located! I shall have occasion to refer to this map again, as well as to some of the very ample statements in this report about both of

Thus you see both of these gentlemen are frequently and in the most conspicuous manner refuted by point-blank testimony over their own signatures.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Breckinride] to give the date of that first statement?
Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. The date is not given, but Mr. BAYNE in-

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. The date is not given, but Mr. BAYNE introduced it in his speech here on Saturday, and its general tenor indicates that it has been written quite recently.

Mr. BAYNE. I think you will find that it bears the date of January 21, 1885.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. It is certainly in this year. The date of the first statement from the reports is several years ago, during the progress of the work.

Mr. SPRINGER. If I do not interrupt the gentleman, I would like to ask him whether, in these comparisons that he is making, he may not be confusing the inner with the outer harbor?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. No, sir. The north jetty has nothing to do with the inner harbor. There is no possibility of that construction. The whole argument is predicated upon this plan, and here are the lines projected into the Gulf and drawings of cross-sections and all that.

Now, there is another statement made by the engineers, which goes to show how those gentlemen are dealing with this work, and how much confidence we can have that they know what they are about or that they would ever do any good there.

that they would ever do any good there.

This statement is in regard to the width between jetties. This officer (Colonel Merrill) says that the statement that the width is to be two and one-fourth miles between the jetties is positively denied by the Chief of Engineers and by the resident engineer. We can only go upon the data given us by the Chief of Engineers, through the War Department, and sent here for our guidance.

Now, sir, here is this chart, indorsed by the final authority and after counsel, and the width is given. It is no "study" map, and it is not so given. You see by it that the outer ends are 12,200 feet apart, considerably more than two and one-fourth miles. The inner ends are somewhat wider. Here are the dividers [producing them], and I invite any gentleman to come here and take the measurement for himself and look at this chart.

Again, it is stated by this gentleman that the statement that there were to be outlets or gaps in the jetties is entirely untrue, that nothing of the kind is mentioned. He says, "I can find no authority for the existence of these outlets." I will only ask the House to look at the printed statements on that point. Colonel Mansfield states in his last report to Congress, which was under the eye of this engineer, that upon the chart he has shown the line of the north jetty—which of course is another place where the north jetty is located. But I am now discussing the question of outlets. I read from part 2, page 1298, report of 1884:

Upon the chart is shown the line of the north jetty, as I propose. It is to project from a point abreast the 25-foot depth in Bolivar channel to 25-foot depth in the Gulf, &c.

Now, take the 26-foot point in Bolivar Channel and measure from that back to the shore, and you will find that it is over 6,000 feet out from the shore, leaving conclusively a gap of largely over a mile in extent. I furthermore state that while I have not seen the chart since it was sent to the Chief of Engineers, for our present advanced set of the report does not contain it, yet I did see it when I was in Galveston last fall, where I went in compliance with a promise I had made to the Texas delegation that I would go and examine into their wants. When I was in Galveston I saw the proposed chart, and it showed a gap of apparently several thousand feet between the shore and the inner end of the north jetty. But the statement I have quoted shows it, and of course the chart referred to is in the office of the Chief of Engineers and was examined by this officer, as he states. Then on page 1414—report of 1882—the board says: "It seems probable that they (the jetties) must be connected with the shore." Do these things indicate gaps or outlets?

The next question is as to the height of these jetties. It should be remembered that all the successful works of this character in the world (of which there are many instances, and some of them over a hundred years old) are jetties that are high enough to conserve the flow which they seek to direct upon the bar, and they are also high enough to prevent sand from being transported over them into the channel, and to prevent their being destroyed by the overfall of waves that would burrow beneath them. It is a great mistake to suppose that mere sand is a compressible base. The trouble with sand is that it is a movable base. In the report of 1830 the board say there is no more trouble here than on the bars of New England, that rubble would easily stand, and they give a cut of the shape it would take. When the foolish man built his house upon the sand, he had no trouble about the sinking of the sand; it was only when the rain descended and the floods came and the winds blew and beat upon that house that it fell, and great was the fall thereof—as was the case with the gabions, and as is the case with much of our sea-work at other places; which, however, I have not time to go into now. They deny that these jetties are to be submerged. If you will look on page 1229, report of 1880, you will find these words:

It has always been assumed that the Galveston jetties are to be submerged.

And it goes on to say that "an average height of five feet above the sand" may "prove sufficient." This is signed by General Newton himself.

Now, as for Major Mansfield upon this point, turn to page 1211, same report. This language is dated in July, about a month after the board had given its counsel, and is sent to Congress in the following December as the conclusion of things. It is by Mr. Ripley, an assistant to Major Mansfield; and on page 1206 Major Mansfield says he is indebted to him for "so clear and comprehensive an exposition of our plans." The report says:

The accompanying tracings show the form and position of each jetty. The south jetty, * * * commencing at the inner end for 4,080 feet the top, is five feet below the water. From this point it slopes up to the water surface.

And it never does get substantially above it. The north jetty amounts to the same thing.

Now, if you want an earlier expression upon this point, see page 733, part 1, report of 1874. Captain Howell, the officer in charge, says: * They may be called submerged jetties, since they will not, except on a short portion of their lines, be built up to the plane of mean low tide, while for the greater part their tops will be five or six feet below that plane.

'General Newton concurred in the report of that year that took no exception to this, but expressed the opinion that if the "piers proposed" were constructed the depth would be increased "in an important degree." Yet these gentlemen tell us that these jetties are not to be submerged. Pray, when and where and by whom have they been changed? Shall we look to the last report of all? I mean the last report of the beard. They see page 1454 propert of 1882. It seems: board. Then see page 1454, report of 1882. It says:

Weadvise that the jetty be almost if not wholly submerged, as originally intended by Major Howell.

And they speak of no part showing its head except "the outer ends."

This language also is signed by General Newton, along with the other members of that board. And yet these gentlemen in question, who are our presumed hope, guides, and support—the ones that suffering commerce and a languishing State all look to—they come and certify such things to us, as if we would never look up their past reports, but would go on suffering forever, and forever sustaining them with the people's millions in wretched experiments that the great marine en-gineers of the world tell us are but child's play. It is in vain for these gentlemen to talk about this as a mere personal question, when the commerce of the country is suffering, or to denounce honorable merchants as "mercenaries," or an honorable and eminent American as being allied with such despicable characters, when they are failing in argument, failing in works, and even failing in statements of fact. have been astounded at these proceedings.

I have been astounded at seeing a high officer of the Government certifying such gross inaccuracies to Congress, and so far forgetting himself as to indulge in billingsgate and slander toward a man and a set of eminent gentlemen who command the respect of all who know them. It has frequently been remarked with us that this at least seemed to be one project where all the lobbyists were left out, much, apparently, to their chagrin, and only plain, honest, earnest argument was employed, headed by such eminent gentlemen as our chairman of the Commerce Committee [Mr. REAGAN] and the other able and distinguished members from Texas and the eminent Senators from that State, a delegation, as a whole, that is an honor to our country.

And now, sir, I come to another feature that has lessened my confidence in the present administration of this work, and which helped to make me conclude that we need to employ some one else if we do not mean to mock the sufferings of 2,000,000 of people. On page 217, part 1, of the last report, the Chief of Engineers, General Newton, says the estimate of 1880 "contemplated the obtainment of a channel across estimate of 1880 "contemplated the obtainment of a channel across the outer bar at least twenty-five feet deep." The last words are in italics. Now, sir, there are two reports from the board in 1880, and both of them are signed by General Newton. One is dated New York, June 7, of that year; and on page 1221 of the report of 1880 you find it stated that the project they had been working under, with Major Howell in charge, contemplated "deepening the outer or Gulf bar from twelve to eighteen feet, possibly." No other contemplated depth is mentioned in the report of the board.

The other reports are the same way. Where they deep the Chief.

The other reports are the same way. Where, then, does the Chief of Engineers get his authority for making that statement to Congress? As a member of the board he has uniformly stated the contrary. There is, however, a place where he gets it, and it carries a moral with it. You a member of the board he has uniformly stated the contrary. There is, however, a place where he gets it, and it carries a moral withit. You will find on page 1214, report of 1880, a statement by Major Mansfield's assistant, Mr. Ripley, regarding the effect of the jetties he proposes. He says: "We should look with confidence for an extreme depth of not less than twenty-five feet." This is the only place in all the reports, from the beginning in 1873 down to this time, where any such mention is made. But General Newton says on page 8, in his letter to our committee, that "these reports have no other value save the authority of their authors." He further says that they are "without any sanction from the proper authority." Is the prophecy of this humble assistant of any "value" to him now? Has it "sanction from the proper authority?" Go back through all the "proper authority" and the maximum purpose stated anywhere is "possibly eighteen feet." How is this to deal with Congress? What hope can we have here?

I showed before that the report of Major Mansfield was what was sent to us for our guidance. He says on page 1206, once quoted, that this report of Mr. Ripley's is "a clear and comprehensive exposition of our plans." Now the Chief of Engineers adopts it, and let us see how he proposes to give us "at least twenty-five feet" of water.

Look at the chart, which is a part of the report, and is signed by Major Mansfield in official form, and look at the text on page 1211 and following:

The scoth interest at the length of 15 220 feet and extends form the first the set text length of 15 220 feet and extends form the first the set text length of 15 220 feet and extends form the first the set text length of 15 220 feet and extends form the first the set text length of 15 220 feet and extends form the first the set text length of 15 220 feet and extends form the first the set text length of 15 220 feet and extends form the first the set text length of 15 220 feet and extends form the first the set text length of 15 220 fe following:

The south jetty has a total length of 15,330 feet, and extends from the 6-foot contour at its inner end to the 13‡-foot contour at its outer end. Commencing at the inner end, the top for 4,080 feet is 5 feet below the water surface.

The north jetty has a total length of 8,090 feet, and extends from the outer end of the Bolivar gabionnade to the 12-foot contour across the bar.

We all know the history of those submerged gabions. Now, sir, here are these submerged jetties 12,200 feet apart—over two and a quarter miles—going scarcely to twelve feet depth, and they, according to this last complexion, are to give us "at least twenty-five feet" of water. Sir, comment is unnecessary.

But the humble assistant and the officer in charge, even when their reports are sent to us professing to be the plan, and that not dissented from by the Chief of Engineers in his accompanying report, are not "the proper authority." Are they "proper authority" now? Pray who is managing this business? The board says on page 1229, report of 1880, in speaking of these jetties:

Neither, however, should be carried more than two miles seaward until the Neither, however, should be carried more than two miles seaward until the other has progressed nearly an equal ratio.

On page 1214, same report, the local engineer says:

There can be no doubt, therefore, that the south jetty is the important one, and should be constructed first.

Now which has been done? There has been constructed nearly four and one half miles of the south jetty and not a foot of the north jetty, unless it be a trial section. Was this according to the plan? Was it by authority?

The map of 1880, says General Newton, page 8 of letter, was a "crude idea." They had been at that work for seven years. Was it still "crude?" In 1881 and in 1882 they leave out the north jetty. In 1883 they locate it, he says, in a different position. Now in 1884 we seem to have another position suspended out in the sea. Is it still crude? I believe it is more crude to-day than it ever was. It is in an inextricable tangle, and neither plan nor men offer the slightest basis

Colonel Merrill also quotes from Major Mansfield and says the south jetty has not been completed. This point is important only as additional evidence of the kind of testimony we are getting and of the faith tional evidence of the kind of testimony we are getting and of the faith we can have in the way matters are going on. I will dispose of it briefly. (See report of 1883, page 1063.) Here is a letter from Major Mansfield to the mayor-elect of Galveston in regard to what it would take to complete this jetty. Congress had failed to pass a river and harbor bill the previous session. Galveston was willing to borrow money and give it to the work, though of course it concerns the whole State of Texas. Major Mansfield says:

One hundred thousand dollars will keep the work on through the summer, and will effect the entire completion of the south jetty.

He got the money and spent it without trouble or delay to the "entire completion" of this jetty, and yet we have this unqualified statement made to us. All of the jetty had been raised to "its full height," except a 6,000-foot gap. They had concluded to bring the jetty higher than any plan had contemplated, and "the $100,000 is necessary to close this gap." Then the jetty will be "built up throughout to level of mean low water," which, as stated, was "entire completion." That is expented of this is enough of this.

Here also Major Mansfield states that he expected this to obtain an 18-foot channel by the following fall, but the only effect of any note was the deepening of a trench on the wrong side of the jetty.

This brings me to the claim now made of the effect of this work upon the channel.

The Chief of Engineers says in his last report that there is "a very apparent improvement in depth over the outer bar."

Major Mansfield says, as quoted here by Colonel Merrill:

The depth of water over the outer bar has been improved so that navigation has been benefited to the extent of about two feet, and this has been accomplished by the Government works, which consist of an incomplete jetty running from Fort Point out to the crest of the bar, a distance of four and one-quarter miles.

Now, the only way to tell what the effect of that jetty has been is to take the depth on the bar at the time it was begun and compare it with the depth on the bar after it is finished. On page 147 of the report for 1880 the Chief of Engineers says:

The appropriation of $500,000 asked for is to be applied to building jetties of brush and stone directed toward obtaining an improved depth of water over the outer bar, where there is now but twelve and three-quarter feet.

Now turn to page 1301 of the last report, and we see that the present depth is stated at "thirteen feet," and as for any movements that have taken place the past year, they are summed up on page 1298 in the expression:

No benefit to navigation has resulted yet.

And on the same page Major Mansfield himself says:

The depth of thirteen feet at mean low tide in the jetty channel of one year ago has been maintained.

Mr. REAGAN. What is the date?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. August 28 of last year. It is the last report we have before Congress. Now, what was the original depth? The original depth was twelve and three-fourths feet, and they have got, as they certify in print here, thirteen feet, which is an increase of just three inches. As shown by their own printed statements it is only three inches. inches, yet these gentlemen report to Congress, and one of them solemnly says, "there is a very apparent improvement in depth over the outer bar," and the other one says it is two feet.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the difference between depth at low tide there and high tide?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. All measurements are calculated at mean low tide unless expressly stated to the contrary. The rise of the tide there is a trifle over a foot.

A MEMBER. Perhaps they made a mistake.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I think they did. The whole thing is a mistake. If they have made a single ordinary mistake they do not explain it. I will say that we have time and again tried to get the Chief of Engineers before the committee to inform us on the subject, but we have never been able to get him there. When we urged him to come

Mr. WILLIS. I hardly think my friend ought to go that far. General Newton was invited before the committee, but replied he was on

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I am going to state that. Last year we invited the Chief of Engineers before our committee to give us information, and we were put off by some question of etiquette. I want to state here, as I understand it, and the chairman can correct me if I am wrong, that while we had discussed this question with Captain Eads, the engineer who represented one view, we invited the Chief of Engineers again, and he declined to come upon the statement that he was on a court-martial that was sitting in the city. Here is a great national work practically in his charge, and a committee of the Federal Congress is considering the matter in a short session; we invite him to meet us, and we are put off in this manner.

Mr. ROSECRANS. He was obliged by order of the Secretary of War to sit on the court-martial, of which the hours are fixed. Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. If it is not a matter of discretion with him then it is all right. None of us seem to have thought of that. There was no court-martial before. It is doubtless as much our fault as his that the Secretary of War was not asked to let the court-martial wait a few hours on the wants of Congress. We have tried this two ways and during two sessions, and we must content ourselves with the printed testimony, which I have mainly gone over. I wish to condemn most strongly this whole way of dealing with the public interests.

Major Mansfield is quoted by Colonel Merrill as saying:

This structure is a most substantial one, and is not likely to deteriorate much.

I presume this means that the jetty is in a good state of preservation. I dislike very much to have to contradict that statement. It is very painful to me, as this whole business is, but I have no right to regard my personal reluctance. I hold in my hand the soundings I made on that jetty last autumn, being in company with Major Mansfield himself, and I estimate that not less than 50 per cent., as shown by the soundings on the creek of the jetty after you get a little out from the shore end, is gone. I have the soundings here in my note-book. Major Mansfield accompanied me in an open boat; I did a part of the soundings, and I had one of his employes do the other part of it, I taking down the notes as we went and making a summary statement of the first part. Major Mansfield may be erroneously quoted; but here are the facts, and they are my guide.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Will the gentleman permit a further question?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Let meask the gentleman first when was that?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. It was last fall; in November of last year. Mr. ROSECRANS. I desire to ask the gentleman (as it is nec to know in connection with such measurements) from what surface he

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I took it from the usual surface of measurement adopted by the engineers. The point is that this jetty is stated in this report to have been brought up by them to mean low tide. That you find established on page 1033, report of 1832, and the oral statements also were made to me. Now, I took my soundings at an unhas all the benefits of the elements on its side. I find in my notes this remark: "The pilot says the water is lower than he has seen it in a long time."

Mr. ROSECRANS. Will my friend permit another question? Did you have any means of knowing how that measurement or point from which you measured compared with the bench-mark usually taken as the low-tide mark?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. The engineer who accompanied me, and also the marine men acquainted with the facts, informed me that at that time it was unusually low tide. The work had previously been a little out of higher water than that, and I am giving its present depth below a lower surface of water.

Mr. ROSECRANS. But the gentleman knows that there is a benchmark from which such comparisons are made.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Of course I do not question that. We all know that.

Mr. ROSECRANS. This bench-mark is the datum plane or line. have had much experience in water measurement, and there may be in such cases a mistake in beginning the measurement from the wrong point, instead of taking a surface point or datum plane which has been established.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Nothing can affect the practical fact that in what I was informed was an unusual low condition of the tide I made this sounding on that jetty, which, as we know, had been brought visibly up to the surface of the water and a little above it, and now, at unusually low tide, I found points—there were plenty of places even then-where a steamboat could run over the jetty, and I have the measurements here to show the facts.

Here they are, running ten, nine, and seven feet under water on the crest, though the average of course is less. Where there happened to be a spit of sand we would find it as shoal as three feet, or even eighteen be a spit of sand we would find it as shoal as three feet, or even eighteen inches; but the outer half of the jetty shows an average depth on the crest of, say, six and one-half feet, with an occasional high point. Near shore it is well preserved, owing to sand there, and to being much higher originally, as shown in the last report, than the other parts.

It is hardly necessary for me to carry this analysis further. I do not believe that there is a single essential statement in General Newton's letter or in the init terms from Colonal Marrill and Maior Manafold.

letter, or in the joint paper from Colonel Merrill and Major Mansfield, that is not as erroneous as these propositions of which I have just treated. This work is but a sample of much that is going on all around the coast. We have made appropriations for other harbors under a species of protest, for we provide a temporary harbor board, to be composed mainly of men not associated with these wretched schemes, most of which assuredly should never have been begun, and that board is to report fully to the next Congress.

I am a plain, business man, and I try to look at things in a plain, common-sense way, and I think that surely there can be no bureau of the Government more sadly in need of refrom than this one is. The officers are free from corruption; but there is a thorough unfitness for this work. There is an easy-going, indifferent, unreliable way of doing things that needs to be stirred up and reorganized from the very bottom. The time has come for a change. The people won't stand this. They ought not to stand it. And we need to start a reform here in Congress. We should select proven ability for these works, settle upon works with greater care, and then make adequate appropriations for them. Unless we are going to complete a work in the right way it is a public duty that we should not undertake it at all.

Mr. ROSECRANS. That is right.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. And let me say here that this should not be a political bill, or a log-rolling measure, or a bill to distribute the public revenues, or anything of that kind. With due regard to the equities it should be a business measure for the improvement of the commerce of our country, with neither Democracy nor Republicanism

Now we propose to employ an engineer second to none in the world, to supply the Secretary of War with money, and to tell him to improve this harbor according to the plans of a man in whom we have confidence. We are not here to do anything for him, but we want to hire him to do something for us. He can make nothing but his $5,000 a year and his $3,000 a foot. He has not the spending of a dollar. He tells us the work must be almost entirely of stone or concrete, and he tells us the approximate cost. We find it far less than the estimates of our engineers of cost for an equal extent of inferior work upon the basis of their South Pass estimates and allowing the usual per cent. for contingencies. This eminent engineer tells us that there is not a particle of doubt about making the work a success. But he will do it as all the great jetty works in the world are done.

How idle are estimates for the present plan! The work is located wrong to start with. Had this sort of work been located right we have no assurance that we have confidence in that any amount of money thus applied would ever get and maintain a good channel. The sea has destroyed all of the north jetty. The tide and teredo have destroyed nearly, if not quite, one-half of the south jetty. The bar would move seaward if the feeble things were finished, and leave you worse off than seaward if the feeble things were missied, and leave you worse of than before. What is your condition now, after vast expenditures? What would it be in this line if you wasted millions in this way? Colonel Merrill says: "It is quite possible," in speaking of such work, "that one or the other [jetty] might require removal."

The doctrine laid down by Eads is to be sure you have mastered your the doctrine laid down by Eads is to be sure you have mastered your subject before you begin work, and then push it with all possible speed. General Newton says Hartley's works at the Sulina mouth of the Danube "were eminently tentative in their character." to be the case. The first work was provisional, but the tracings were exactly the same, and when Hartley began his work he pushed out upon his lines with the utmost dispatch. The Dutch works of the Scheur branch of the River Maas, says General Newton, "is a case where heroic treatment has been applied, with the result of an immediate failure." The reverse is true. The treatment was feeble. The jetties were much wider apart than was the cut that supplied water for them; consequently a vast amount of dredging had to be done; and instead of the bar being dispersed by a vigorous current, it was simply turned over by slow degrees to be as bad an obstruction as it was be-fore. They have since imparted energy to the current by adequate contraction.

Now shall we stop this trifling and give these people a harbor? Here are nine hundred miles of coast and not a harbor. Here is the first cotton-growing State in the Union, here is the first wool-producing State in the Union, here is the first cattle-raising State in the Union, here are over 2,000,000 of people, $120,000,000 annually of farm products, $1,000,000,000 of the people's wealth, 6,000 miles of railroads carrying their commerce, not to speak of adjacent States, and all are suffering from the lack of a harbor. The entire territory dependent is equal to all of the New England States, and New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, North Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee, Iowa, Minnesota, and Nebraska. Shall we give this region a harbor? I say yes, and I call the attention of Congress to the striking fact that from Hampton Roads, almost at the base of the Capitol, to the Mexican line, nearly 3,000 miles, there is only one harbor entrance where a first-class merchantman or a well-appointed man-of-war can float. That is the South Pass of the Mississippi River. Pensacola is questionable and un-

Mr. DIBBLE. Will the gentleman from Arkansas permit me to interrupt him long enough to say that Port Royal, on the South Carolina coast, has twenty-six feet of water?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. The commerce of that point is so small that did not remember it. I accept the statement of the gentleman. There seems to be that remote point which has twenty-six feet of water. But take a city like Wilmington or Savannah or Charleston or Mobile. They are all second or even third-class harbors; and our commerce must not be compelled to make the long and expensive hauls to New Orleans and Hampton Roads.

Mr. KING. Twenty-six feet of water does not admit a first-class man-of-war or modern merchantman.

Mr. DIBBLE. The Great Eastern only draws twenty-eight feet. Mr. KING. In New Orleans a ship drawing twenty-nine or thirty feet can enter.

Mr. NICHOLLS rose.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Do not talk across me. I have no time to yield for further interruption.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one other point I desire to discuss—and these remarks are much less complete and much less compact than would like to make them.

I want to call attention to our action about the Mississippi River Commission. The bill shows that we provide for an advisory engineer for the commission, and we recommend that James B. Eads be appointed to the place, and we require the Secretary of War to carry on the improvement of that river according to the plans, &c., of the commission as the same may be approved or amended by the advisory engineer.

This, too, has been rightly called a radical step. Nothing of an ordinary character could justify us for a moment in taking such a step as nary character could justify us for a moment in taking such a step as this, and it is proper and unavoidable that the House and the country be given the reasons for our course. I will say that it is the result of the most mature consideration and counsel; and at a very full sitting of the committee, after long and protracted discussion, all present agreed to this step except my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE]. I do not consider it necessary to reply to the dissenting argument my friend has made. It needs no reply. It is proper to say that my friend from West Virginia [Mr. Gibson], who also dissents, was not present at that meeting. His speech needs no reply. I can not but hope that had he been present and participated in our lengthy and earnest proceedings he would have concurred in our general purpose. But of course this is conjectural.

I will try to explain the reasons for our decision.

This commission was organized under an act approved June 28, 1879.

It was composed of seven members: Col. Q. A. Gillmore, president of the commission; Maj. Charles R. Suter, Maj. C. B. Comstock, all of the Engineer Corps of the Army; James B. Eads and B. M. Harrod, civil engineers, and Hon. Benjamin Harrison, now a Senator from Indiana. The personnel has somewhat changed—Mr. Eads has gone out, Mr. Harrison has gone out; but I need not dwell upon that. In plain terms, they were to take charge of the whole question of the improvement of the Mississippi River from Cairo to the Gulf. Their jurisdiction is now somewhat enlarged. The idea of a board or commission for this vast and vital business was and still is a wise one.

After long and mature consideration the commission agreed upon a plan for the improvement of the river. That plan is set forth in their first report (Senate Executive Document No. 58, second session Forty-sixth Congress, and dated March 6, 1880). The report treats with great clearness of the philosophy of the case, and it lays down a plan of work in conformity thereto, reciting successful practice. It is not necessary for me to recite the accompanying dissenting report of Major Comstock and Mr. Harrison, for they concur in the general features and only dissent in "some less important points." This plan has received the approval of Congress and the country. This is evinced by several appropriations by Congress, aggregating over $8,000,000, which, with the appropriation in this bill, will amount to over $11,000,000. I do not include anything above Cairo. The people have applauded this; executives have recommended it, and both political parties in national convention have pledged themselves to the continuation of the work.

Now, sir, what is the plan to which we have pinned our faith, and After long and mature consideration the commission agreed upon a

Now, sir, what is the plan to which we have pinned our faith, and of which we have no reason to doubt. I can best state it by reading extracts from the first report of the commission. On page 16 it says:

It has been observed in the Mississippi River, and is indeed true of all silt-bearing streams flowing through alluvial deposits, that the more nearly the high river width, or width between the banks, approaches to uniformity, the more nearly uniform will be the channel depth, the less will be the variations of velocity, and the less the rate of caving to be expected in concave bends. * * * Uniformity of width secured by contraction will produce increased velocity, and

spending deposit of silt at the deep places, and consequently greater uniformity of depth.

Uniform depth joined to uniform width—that is to say, uniformity of effective cross-section—implies uniform velocity, and this means that there will be no violent eddies or cross-currents, and no great and sudden fluctuations in the silt-transporting power of the current. There will, therefore, be less crosion from oblique currents and eddies, and no formation of shoals and bars produced by silt taken up from one part of the channel and dropped in another.

The work to be done, therefore, is to scour out and maintain a channel through the shoals and bars * * * and to build up new banks and develop new shore lines, so as to establish, so far as practicable, the requisite conditions of uniform velocity for all stages of the river.

This improvement can be accomplished below Cairo by contracting the low-water channel way to an approximately uniform width of about 3,000 feet, * * by causing, through the action of appropriate works constructed at suitable localities, the deposition of sand and other earthy materials transported by the water upon the dry bars and other portions of the present bed not embraced within the limits of the proposed low-water channel. The ultimate effect sought to be produced by such deposits is a comparative uniformity in the width of the high-water channel of the river.

These constructions will commonly be open or permeable to such a degree that * * they will sufficiently check the current to induce a deposit of silt in selected localities.

I could cite more, but this is enough. I will add, however, that an-

I could cite more, but this is enough. I will add, however, that another important feature was the closure of outlets of which the Atchafalaya was perhaps the most important. It was agreed to at once stop the enlargement of that outlet, but not to take further action until the report of Major Benyaurd, who was then making a survey of it, should be received. The estimated cost of the first step was $10,000.

I will now turn to the second report of the commission (there was another report the meanwhile, which, however, relates principally to other matters), which is dated November 25, 1881, and begins on page 2745 of the report of the Chief of Engineers of that year. In this report the commission shows that it has not silled the Atchafalaya, and it continues to promise that the initial step shall be taken. Running through the whole report there is a confusion of thought, and therefore I turn to the report of Mr. Eads, which accompanies the report of the commission, for a plain and clear restatement of the original plan of improvement. Mr. Eads, I believe, was also the author of the first report report.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the author of the first report was Captain Eads?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. It is so stated.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I wish to say that I have known that all along

Mr. ROSECRANS. I wish to say that I have known that all along since I have known anything about engineering, and it is good sense.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I will not go over Mr. Eads's reasoning about the Atchafalaya, in the course of which he urges most strenuously that immediate action be taken toward the closure of that perilous outlet, and says that the closure should be completed in "six years," so as to restrain "about one-sixth of its volume per annum."
This general subject is also treated with the greatest clearness and ability in the report signed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] ity in the report signed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Thomas] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Ellis]—in their report accompanying the Burrows report. These two papers are masterly and complete, and no thoughtful man can read them without concluding that advocates of the "outlet" theory are among the most mistaken of men. There is no proposition more opposed to numberless facts, more inconsistent with reason, or more universally condemned by all classes of engineers. But Mr. Eads, in summing up the adopted plan on page 2775, says:

The plan of improvement recommended by the commission differs from any other previously proposed for the correction of the channel in the fact that it looks to a rectification of the high-water channel by the ultimate narrowing of these wide places as the only method by which a deep and uniform low-water channel can be permanently secured.

The wide places in the high-water channel create alternations of current velocity and steeper slopes to overcome the excessive frictional resistance. These cause the water to be highly charged with sediment at one part of its journey to the sea and much less highly charged at others. This creates scouring and depositing in the bed, and radical changes in the channel by the caving away of its banks.

By reducing these wide places to a width approximately the same as that of the narrow parts of the river the friction is reduced, a lower slope and uniform depth will be obtained, and the velocity of current will not be subject to its present changes. A uniform charge of current will result from uniform current velocity, and the caving of the banks will then be practically arrested, for the reason that when the water has the full charge of sediment due to its velocity it can carry no more, and can not, therefore, soon the channel more deeply, by which the undermining of the banks is effected.

Permanence of channel will not, therefore, be secured until these excessive widths are reduced. A less depth at low water than twenty feet will not insure stability of channel, for the reason that a less depth will result from only a partial reduction of the wide places. Permanence of channel will be attained only in proportion as uniformity of width of the high-water channel is attained, and when this is secured the depth at low water may be considerably more than twenty feet, but it will certainly not be less. The sooner these wide places are corrected the less will the improvement of the river cost.

There can be no doubt of the entire feasibility of so correcting the Mississippi River from Cairo to the Gulf that a channel depth of twenty feet during the low-water seasons can be permanently secured throughout its entire course.

Upon the basis of this plan the commission estimated, on page 2752 Countries of 1881, that the entire cost of improving the six reaches from Cairo to Red River, one hundred and eighty-four miles, would be $8,226,000, and for the entire river to that point $33,000,000. There was no material dissent from this. After this the breach between Captain Eads and the majority of the commission further widened. Captain Eads contended for a faithful adherence to the plan and doctrine laid down, while the majority of the commission seemed unable to realize the fixed laws of nature; they never seemed to clearly grasp the problem in hand, and they varied and dallied as men often do in controversy and when they immediately confront a question too great for them, the principles of which in calm moments they clearly admit.

The very simplicity of the great question seems to baffle them. They failed to grasp the central facts and ideas. The result of this was that Captain Eads afterward resigned from the commission, it being an open secret that he did so in order to escape the responsibility of errors which he had clearly pointed out but could not avert. He did not participate in the proceedings of the commission after the report I have quoted from. The country did not appreciate the force of the weak tendency that had set in, and I know that it was only near the close of the last session of Congress that, for my own part, I became fully aware and seriously alarmed at the course the commission was taking.

It then began to appear plain to me that the commission was radically and fatally departing from the plan of work we thought they were pursuing, and I have since studied the reports with greater care than before, and I have renewed my examination of most of their work. This departure has been a growth. It has been like increasing weak-ness, until now the present report comes to us, and it contains plans and statements that must be squarely met by all who have real con-and statements that must be squarely met by all who have real convictions or any high purpose in connection with the river.

I will trace this matter. In the next report after the one I last read from—that is in the report for 1882, after Eads had ceased to take a part in the proceedings—you find in a paper from Professor Mitchell, a member of the commission, a gentleman looked upon as simply a technical adviser, the following language on page 263:

Indeed, under the general rule that the bars form at the reversion points of curves it is evident that their position must vary as these curves vary, and that the holding of the curves by revetment or otherwise is an essential early step in the control of the river. It antedates logically the retrenchment which is to deepen the water at the bars.

This is a new doctrine. It is true it is put in an obscure place, and in very small print; but it comes, as by request, from one of the commission, and it seems as if they are seeking a new conclusion.

We had previously been told that to narrow these wide and shoal places by silt-arresting works was the only method by which a deep and uniform low-water channel can be permanently secured.

Of course this was to be in connection with high-water treatment. We were also told that

The wide places in the high-water channel create alternations of current velocity, &c.

And then that-

This creates * * radical changes in the channel by the caving away of its

We were told that-

Permanence of channel will not, therefore, be secured until these excessive widths are reduced.

And that when we properly reduce these excessive widths where the Uniform depth will be obtained and the velocity of current will not be subject to its present changes.

When that is done-

A uniform charge of current will result.

And that-

The caving of the banks will then be practically arrested.

This stands to reason, and it has never failed in all its numerous practice. The professor loses sight of the cross-over bars in the channel, where you find from five to fifteen feet of water, while in the caving bends the water is, say, one hundred feet deep and often deeper. submerged bars always join the lower and the upper ends of the dry bars, and they are not "at the reversion points of curves;" but they form just where the river passes the sustaining wall or bank that has been caving and spreads out and unloads at this wide and sluggish point infloods, preparatory to running with increased and destructive velocity into the next bend below. This is the bar that causes the mischief. This is the bar that was to be "scoured out" by contracting the dry bars just here and at their other parts as additional aid as the "only" method by which the river could possibly be improved. Now, this contraction upon these wide bars is to be preceded by something else.

If the Mississippi River were dry and you started in a buggy to drive down its bed from Cairo to the Gulf you would have a very up and down hill road to travel. In places you would be in a deep and narrow gorge, and again you would be upon a hill-top, nearly up to the brink of the bank, and a broad expanse of sand would stretch out perhaps for miles on either side of you. You would then be up on a sand bar, while your previous position was where there had been a caving bend. Now, suppose this bed be filled again with a great flood. You readily see that when the water gets to the broad and shallow bar it spreads out and loses a part of its velocity.

The velocity is also diminished by the friction opposed to the water by this vast exposure of bottom surface. A part of the sediment that the river was able to carry before it was thus retarded by dispersion and by friction is of course at once dropped to the bottom. Thus the bar goes on building down-stream, adding below what may be picked up at its head. But the water has a certain distance to fall before it reaches the Gulf, and it will make up for this almost no surface slope upon the bar by plunging headlong into the bend below, and in its new course it will pick up a new load of sediment from the bottom. This destroys the repose of the bank, and as soon as the sustaining pressure of the water is taken from the side of the bank by the falling of the water the bank will begin to cave in. They are land slides.

This new load of sediment will not be dropped until another wide place is reached, at which the river will again spread out and the same operation will be repeated, this new bar causing the same trouble below it that the previous bar has caused just above. Wide places and sand bars are exchangeable terms. I repeat that the cure laid down for this trouble is to remove the cause. That is to say, you will that contraction works at the wide places so as to bring the river at that point to its normal and proper width. Then the river may want to spread, but you will not let it. If you do not let it disperse, then it can not drop its load of sediment. If it is kept loaded, then it can not take up any more load when it gets into the next bend. As I said before, the slope of the surface of the water is nearly level on a bar. As soon as it gets over the bar the slope of the water is steep compared to what it was on the bar, and of course the current is correspondingly swift.

But you will soon make the water cut out the bar, and you then not only send the current loaded into the bend, but you also, by the removal of the bar, have deprived the current of the cause of its excessive velocity. You have then brought about a general state of uniformity. Then it is that "the caving of the banks will be practically arrested." What revetting you then must do will be only an incident and easy to do. A good deal of this sort would be needed; but it will be easy to do, and comparatively inexpensive.

If it be said that the works are imperiled, I reply that you are putting them where the river is constructive and not destructive.

treat the river at its lazy parts and help it to follow its natural bent.

This then was to be done by proper contraction at the excessively wide places. The constructions for this purpose were to be "commonly open or permeable" so that they will sufficiently check the current to induce a deposit of silt in selected localities. They were to effect "the deposition of sand and other earthy materials transported by the water upon the dry bars and other portions of the present bed not embraced within the limits of the proposed low-water channel."

This is what was to be done, so that the water would be made to remove the bars, the cause of the caving, for surely we can do nothing unless we can hold the banks.

Now, however, they are not going to effect a cure by removing the cause, but by treating the effect. They have changed their views as to what is the cause. We shall see later on how futile it is to go into the teeth of the river in this way, and then we can better judge whether or not we ought to permit the commission to commit us to this change of plan.

What I have read from Professor Mitchell's paper prepares us to expect the expression in the main report, page 11, "the main item of cost will of course be the bank protection." This was the only prominent intimation then of these growing errors. It is very forcible in the light of later events.

And so matters go until near the close of last session we had the commission before the River and Harbor Committee. It is sufficient to say that their influence with the committee was much greater before we heard them than it was afterward. Soon after that we were startled with the information that the extensive revetment work at Memphis and in Hopefield bend was a total loss, and that great city was in imminent peril, with the vital interests of the vast commerce that seeks its facilities in equal danger. We found that the entire work there had been upon this new plan. Last session Congress gave $200,000 for the emerupon this new plan. Last session Congress gave $200,000 for the emergency, and we find that it too is being spent in the same way. Not a gency, and we find that it too is being spent in the same way. Not a dollar has been or is being spent to remove the cause of all this trouble; that is, the bars above. They revet where the water is one hundred and one hundred and five feet deep, while just above lie the fatal bars, with some eight and twelve feet of depth. This is only a sample of vast quantities of work, nay, of the present prevailing policy. Reason and the adoption of the plan we thought they were adhering to has not prevented their going into this foolish and ruinous departure.

Experience teaches them nothing. The current continues to come upon them with unabated fury, stripped of its load and ready for the fray, and poor obstinate man stands there fighting the laws of God.

Why not conform to nature and seek her potent aid? Is it because their great rival told them what to do and they are unwilling to learn? Are the public interests to suffer for this? Eads told them the truth. He understood the case. It is not Eads we are fighting for or the com-He understood the case. It is not had we are lighting for or the commission we are fighting against. It is the engineering truth we want, and he happened to understand it and these gentlemen do not. We are pressing forward for the public interests. Men must stand the consequences of their errors, and pique and pride can no more control the Mississippi River than could Canute, by waving his feeble scepter, cause the tide to recede. The plain Dutch have done with their searcher what his meiostre could not call the control of th works what his majesty could not achieve.

Look further into their last report. You find estimates for various harbors on the river aggregating $2,014,000, and every dollar is for revetment. You find on page 4 that they propose a systematic course of revetment for the bends from Cairo down. This they propose to do and to let the river scour out its bars, &c., aided only by revetment, impossible as a first step, instead of proceeding in the line of nature's work. This work, as is clearly deducible from their estimates, will cost at the least over $130,000 a mile, including plant, while from what they are now trying at Memphis I think the estimate may be more safely put at $30 a foot than at $20, if it is to be carried to the maximum depth, and we have scarcely a hope of stability short of that. The same policy is largely practiced in the reaches under treatment. They estimated in 1880 that, say, $1,250,000 would complete Providence reach, and they have now spent, say, $2,000,000 on it, and the report says as much more is required.

For Plum Point reach they estimated less than $1,500,000, and they have spent over $2,000,000 on it, with the intimation of spending in all $4,000,000, with no limit then fixed. For one of the commission says, on page 32, that they will spend three times the original estimates on these reaches, and then the final sum is undetermined. The Atchafathese reaches, and then the final sum is undetermined. The Atchafalaya is not even silled yet, and to-day the whole North is in grave danger of being cut off from the Gulf, and New Orleans is in grave danger of being cut off from the North. All this is the result of deviations from the adopted plan. There is a grave duty for us to discharge here. Can we permit this? Is there a gentleman here who ever dreamed of permitting these deviations from the adopted plan for treating the Can we countenance them for a moment by look, or word, or vote? How are we to act as custodians of the public funds and of this grand river? I expect accidents; I can pardon errors; but I can not condone this radical, fundamental, foolish, and ruinous change of policy.

Gentlemen, it must be done openly. It can not be hid in a corner. The plain way, the honest way, and the manly way is the only way. We must rebuke those who deserve it. We must in every way merit the confidence of the country. The country has given and will give freely of its money. It asks only frankness and candor of us. Can you fail to stop these departures? Can you ask money for these wretched experiments? Have you a particle of doubt of your true plan? The former offers untold expense and no results. The latter is reasonable in amount and has never failed. Where contraction has been only partially completed the results are perfect to that extent. Of course enemies to the West, the special pleaders of Eastern railroad corporations, will pervert the truth and seek to take advantage of our candor and of our dilemma; but we can not help this, and they can candor and of our dilemma; but we can not help this, and they can not fool the House or the people. This is the condition in reports and from observation. We must make them go back to what we have confidence in. They must stop this ceaseless revetting, and first remove the bars which are the cause of the trouble. You never find a caving bend but what there is a bar above it. You never find a caving reach but what there is a bar in the middle and a surplus channel to be closed.

Mr. ROSECRANS. Will the gentleman permit an interruption of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Pardon me; I have only a moment left. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? The statements I make are plain in the proof.

Rent for Third-Class Post-Offices.

SPEECH

HON. CHARLES R. SKINNER,

OF NEW YORK.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 12, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 8138) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

Mr. SKINNER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I desire to present some reasons for the adoption of the amendment offered to this bill extending to post-offices of the third class allowances for rent, placing them upon an equal footing with postoffices of the first and second classes.

The present law is a manifest injustice to nearly 2,000 of the most he present law is a maintest injustice to hearly 2,000 of the most faithful of our public servants—postmasters of the third class. It will be seen by a table annexed that the whole number of post-offices in the United States on the 24th of January last was 50,857. Of this number 48,525 are offices of the fourth class, embracing all offices where the salary is below $1,000 per annum. There are only 81 offices of the first class, 404 of the second class, and 1,847 of the third class. These are fairly scattered over the entire Union. There is little reason why the fices are supplied. It is frequently urged that post-offices of the third class are located in stores or places of business, and the salary shared by postmasters with merchants and others who actually transact the business. This impression is erroneous.

The statement may be true regarding a great number of fourth-class offices, but if members will take pains to investigate they will find that third-class offices are, with very few exceptions, located in rooms not connected with mercantile pursuits and the rent paid comes squarely out of the salary of the postmaster, in addition to demands upon him for clerk-hire, fuel, &c. I do not recall a single third-class office in the district I represent which is not wholly independent of any other business.

It seems to me selfish and unreasonable to allow rent to four hundred and eighty-five post-offices of first and second class and deny it to 1,847 post-offices of the third class, where the requirements are proportionably as great and where usually the officer devotes all his time and the whole of his salary in serving the public. The allowance asked for would result in more convenient offices and a better service to the

I had the honor to introduce a bill in the first session of the present Congress upon this subject, H. R. 5254, and by instruction of the Com-mittee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, on February 20, 1884, I submitted the following report:

mitted the following report:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2410) to amend section 3860 of the Revised Statutes, allowing compensation to post-offices of the third class for office-rent, clerk-hire, &c., respectfully submit the following report:

The bill originally introduced and referred to the committee (H. R. 2410) was as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c., That section 3860 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"Sec, 3860. The Postmaster-General may allow to the postmaster at New York city, and to postmasters at offices of the first, second, and third classes, out of the surplus revenues of their respective offices—that is to say, the excess of box-rents and commissions over and above the salary assigned to the office—a reasonable sum for the necessary ocst of rent, fuel, lights, furniture, stationery, printing, clerks, and necessary incidentals, to be adjusted on a satisfactory exhibit of the facts; and no such allowance shall be made except upon the order of the Postmaster-General.'"

The purpose of the original bill was, by inserting the word "third" in the section above given, to extend to post-offices of the third class allowances of a reasonable sum for the necessary cost of rent, fuel, lights, furniture, stationery, printing, clerks, and incidentals, to be adjusted on a satisfactory exhibit of the facts, and made upon the order of the Postmaster-General. Allowances of a like character are now made by the section above referred to to post-offices of the first and second classes, which classes include all post-offices where the salary is $2,000 or over. There is a manifest injustice in making allowances for rent, clerk-hire, fuel, furniture, &c., at a second-class office, the salary at which is $2,000, and denying allowances at offices where the salary is $1,000, and denying allowances at offices where the salary is $1,000, and denying allowances at offices where the salary is $1,000, and denying allowances at offices where the and denying allowances at offices where the salary is $1,900, or less, down to $1,000.

With the exception of allowances sometimes made for distribution at separating post-offices, no postmaster at an office of the third class can, under the present law, receive any allowance for any of the expenses of conducting his office, and he is obliged to expend a large portion of his salary for office expenses which the Government now allows to offices of the first and second classes. If it is right in one case it would seem to be right in the other.

The estimate of the Post-Office Department, submitted in a later portion of this report, for allowances referred to in the original bill to offices of the third class is $1,683,000, the number of offices being estimated at 1,800 on the 1st of July, 1884.

The committee have given the matter careful consideration, including the esti-

The committee have given the matter careful consideration, including the estimate above given, and after full discussion have adopted the following substitute for bill H. R. 2410, which is respectfully submitted:

"H. R. 5254, a bill to authorize the Postmaster-General to make allowances for rent to post-offices of the third class.

"H. R. 5254, a bill to authorize the Postmaster-General to make allowances for rent to post-offices of the third class.

"Be itenacted, dc., That the Postmaster-General may allow to the postmasters at offices of the third class, out of the surplus revenues of their respective offices—that is to say, the excess of box-rents and commissions over and above the salary assigned to the office—a reasonable sum for the necessary cost of rent, to be adjusted on a satisfactory exhibit of the facts; and no such allowance shall be made except upon the order of the Postmaster-General."

The purpose of the substitute is to authorize the Postmaster-General to make an allowance for a reasonable sum for rent only to post-offices of the third class. While the bill does not go as far as some members of the committee would desire, the substitute is accepted by them as a step in the direction of justice. It is believed that it will result in giving better accommodations to a large number of post-offices throughout the country, and thus directly benefit the people by giving them improved facilities for the transaction of postal business. The amount estimated, in order to carry out the provisions of this bill, as by a table attached hereto, is $432,000.

In his last report to the Postmaster-General the First Assistant Postmaster-General for 1883:

"During the year one hundred and fifty-six lease cases were prepared, and at the close of the year, June 30, 1883, one hundred and eighty-eight leases were in operation, involving an aggregate sum of $254,181 for rent.

"The leasing of buildings, rooms, and fixtures for postal purposes is one of the most important duties of this division, not only because the additional facilities for the transaction of postal business secured by leasing better accommodations results in a better service and in largely increasing the revenues of the Department.

"This increase of revenue is substantial evidence that the people appreciate improvements in this direction. And there is room for advancement, for limit of allowance for rent should be reached when the second-class of-

The Postmaster-General also says, page 105 of his report:

OFFICE-RENT AT THIRD-CLASS POST-OFFICE

In another part of this report (under the head of "leases") I touched upon the subject of the Government paying the office-rent at third-class offices. This is an important matter, as you know, especially to a class of meritorious postmaters. I consider these postmasters, as a class, the most deserving of attention at the present time; and, as I have heretofore said, it is a great hardship to compel them to pay their office expenses. I therefore recommend that provision be made for paying at least the office rent at offices of this class.

In this connection I desire to submit the following table:

The estimate of the Post-Office Department furnished to me at the time the report was made (February, 1884), when the number of third-class post-offices was 1,745, was $419,975—a very insignificant amount when we consider the vast sum carried in the Post-Office appropriation bill, and when we consider further the great advantage to the general public in improved offices and increased facilities which would follow a small expenditure by postmasters in better equipping their offices for the convenience of the millions who use them.

A bill has already passed the Senate, and now lies upon the Speaker's table, as follows (S. 1508):

table, as follows (S. 1508):

An act to authorize the Postmaster-General to lease premises for use of postoffices of the first, second, and third classes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Postmaster-General may lease premises for use of post-offices of the first, second, and third classes, at a reasonable annual rental, to be paid quarterly; but no lease shall be made for a term exceeding ten years; and whenever any building, or part of a building, under lease, becomes unfit for use as a post-office, no rent shall be paid until the same shall be put in a satisfactory condition for occupation as a post-office, or the lease may be canceled, at the option of the Postmaster-General; and a lease shall cease and terminate whenever a post-office can be moved into a Government building.

A similar bill was introduced by me at the first session of the present

A similar bill was introduced by me at the first session of the present Congress, and reported favorably from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The report made upon that bill, April 12, 1884, is as follows:

Mr. Charles R. Skinner, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-toads, submitted the following report (to accompany bill H. R. 5091): The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5091) authorizing the Postmaster-General to lease premises for use of post-offices of the first, second, and third class, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report:

The bill (H. R. 5091) as originally introduced is as follows:

A slight amendment was made to the bill by adding thereto the following words: "Provided, That this act shall apply to the District of Columbia."

The object of this amendment is to give the Postmaster-General authority to lease branch offices in the District of Columbia.

The necessity for the enactment of the proposed law lies in the fact that the Postmaster-General, under existing law, has no authority to lease a building for post-office purposes for a longer period than one year or beyond the life of the annual appropriation. The Court of Claims has recently rendered a decision upon this point. While leases are often made, in fact, for a longer period than one year, they are made without authority of law, and the Department can not be bound for more than one year.

In his last annual report (page 10) the Postmaster-General says in reference to leases as follows:

"The only authority for renting buildings to be occupied as post-offices is the one year, mey are mane without authority of law, and the Department can now be bound for more than one year.

In his last annual report (page 10) the Postmaster-General says in reference to leases as follows:

"The only authority for renting buildings to be occupied as post-offices is the annual appropriation for the payment of their rent. Under it the Department can not take a lease for more than one year. For obvious reasons landlords demand a higher rate for one year than for several years. It has been the practice of my predecessors to take leases from one to ten years, and sometimes for a longer period. All leases for more than one year are now made subject to the condition that Congress shall make the necessary appropriation to pay the rent. I recommend that authority be given to the Postmaster-General to rent at reasonable rates suitable buildings for four years, or such other time as may be deemed advisable."

The First Assistant Postmaster-General, 1883), says:

"Great embarrassment in leasing buildings for post-office use now exists, on account of a lack of well-defined authority to make contracts beyond the fiscal year; or, in other words, in the absence of a special statute it is deemed best not to bind the Government for a longer term than the fiscal year covered by the appropriation applicable for the payment of rent. This should be remedied without unnecessary delay.

"One of the primary objects in making a lease for a term of years is a minimum rental. This can generally be secured when reasonable assurance can be given that the rent will be paid for four or more years, but parties having capital to put into buildings for postal purposes will not accept annual leases at low figures. The Government is therefore obliged to pay higher rates than private citizens; and, practically, leases are little more than yearly allowances for rent. In my judgment it will not be advisable to name a specific term of years. Generally the time should be limited to four years, but cases occur where it is in the inte

Suspension of Silver Coinage.

SPEECH

HON. ABRAM S. HEWITT,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 2, 1885,

On the provision of the sundry civil bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend the coinage of standard silver dollars.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, said:
Mr. Speaker: At the present time all of our national obligations are paid in gold, or in greenbacks which are redeemable in gold, or in silver dollars or silver certificates which have up to this time been kept equivalent to gold. The gold dollar of 25.8 grains is by law the standard of value in the United States. Because the gold dollar is the standard of value we are enabled to make all domestic and foreign exchanges with ease and certainty and without discount for inequalities of value in

The maintenance of a uniform standard of value is a matter of pri-The maintenance of a uniform standard of value is a matter of primary concern to society, and is one of the fundamental conditions of good government and national prosperity. Any disturbance in the standard of value unsettles business, destroys confidence, and restricts the area of employment. No physical calamity, not earthquakes nor famines produce such disastrous results as a fluctuating standard of value. If, therefore, we are threatened with such a calamity we owe it to the people to avert it by prompt action. The vote of every man in this House on the pending proposition to give authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend the coinage of silver during the ensuing fiscal year, in case he shall find that its continuance will destroy the equivalency which now exists between the various kinds of currency used as money, will depend upon the opinion he may form as to the probability of a suspension of payments in gold or its equivalent for the national obligations. Is there any reason to fear an early suspension of gold payments?

It is a fact that the silver dollars which we coin are to-day only worth for the metal they contain 83 per cent. of the gold value of a dollar. A month ago they were worth 85 cents each. It is well known that the money of lesser value, as soon as there is enough of it to meet the daily requirements of business, invariably drives the more valuable money out of circulation. It is therefore certain that the continued coinage of silverdollars intrinsically worth less than the gold dollar, will sooner of silver dollars, intrinsically worth less than the gold dollar, will sooner or later drive gold money out of circulation, It is only a question of amount, and therefore of time, if we go on coining silver dollars of less

Are we approaching an amount of silver coinage sufficiently large to begin the expulsion of gold at an early date? In the opinion of the most intelligent and skillful financial authorities the time is near at hand. We have coined nearly 200,000,000 of 83-cent dollars. It is found that the country uses about 100,000,000 of those dollars, mainly in the form of paper certificates, in its current operations. Beyond this amount there is a very prompt return of the excess to the Treasury, notwithstanding the most persistent efforts to keep them in circulation.

The silver saturation point has therefore been reached, and already in New York silver certificates are daily purchased for the payment of duties at one thirty-second per cent. discount. The Treasury has reached the point where its current regular receipts are mainly in silver certificates. the point where its current regular receipts are mainly in silver certificates. Its gold balances have only been maintained by bearing the cost of transportation of bullion and coin at a very heavy and an increasing charge. The Secretary of the Treasury has warned us in his annual report that the time is not far distant when we shall pass from the gold to the silver basis unless the coinage of silver dollars shall be suspended. I think I am safe in saying that he has made strenuous and successful efforts to prevent the suspension of gold payments during his term of office, which will expire on the 4th of March. The steady progress toward such a state of the Treasury as will necessitate the stoppage of gold payments will be apparent from the following statestoppage of gold payments will be apparent from the following statements prepared at the Department, showing the percentage of gold secured from customs at New York has diminished from 49 per cent. in July to 19.7 per cent. in December, while during the same time the percentage of silver receipts has increased from 32½ per cent. to 43.9 per cent.

During the same time the net gold in the Treasury has run down from 61 per cent. to 521 per cent., while the percentage of silver has risen from 10 to 19 per cent.

At this rate the suspension of gold payments is only a question of time, and there is danger that it may occur before Congress shall meet again in December. In that event the responsibility will be charged to a Democratic administration, and, in case we fail to take action to avoid it, upon a Democratic House. The former charge will be unjust; the latter charge will be true, because we can avert this calamity by giving to the new administration the power temporarily to suspend the coinage of silver in case it shall be found necessary in order to preserve the gold standard. This authority will not be exercised unless it shall be found to be necessary, but if the authority shall not exist, in case the necessity should arise, then the country will properly hold this side of the House responsible for the convulsion and distress which will

If these views are correct no member will hesitate to vote for the proposed measure unless he desires to place the country on a silver basis. There may be gentlemen who think that this is a result desirable to be I entreat them to consider well the consequences of their reached.

All property or wealth is either visible or invisible. The bulk of the visible property, such as lands, houses, railways, factories, and stocks of merchandise and commodities of all kinds, is owned by the rich. The invisible property, on the other hand, is mainly order of permanent moderate means and by those who gain their daily bread by their daily bread by their daily breads in property because it yields an income. It is usually The invisible property, on the other hand, is mainly owned by people of labor. Labor is property, because it yields an income. It is usually the only property which the workman has to sell. If he possesses any other property beyond his household goods it is in the form of savings deposited with a benefit society or in a savings bank or, if he be somewhat forehanded, accumulated in the form of a life insurance. But his property is thus always invisible to the eye, although it has a money value in common with the visible and substantial property of the rich. value in common with the visible and substantial property of the rich. Any change in the value of the money which measures his property is of no less consequence to the poor man than it is to the rich. Indeed it is of infinitely greater consequence, for if money be debased in value, that is, be diminished in purchasing power, all forms of visible property at once rise in price to make up for the diminution in the value of the medium of exchange. The rich man, therefore, who owns the visible property is not injured by the debasement of money, except so far as he has invisible property in the form of debts due from others. Against loss from this cause he can, and usually does, protect himself on long engagements by stipulating for payment in gold of a fixed standard of weight and fineness.

But the poor man and the working classes can not thus protect them-The wages which the workman receives are adjusted to the exselves. The wages which the workman receives are adjusted to the existing standard of value. When this is debased they do not rise in a corresponding degree. They are determined by demand and supply, and in times of depression in business like the present, when there are two men everywhere seeking for one man's job, a rise of wages is impossible. Debasement in the purchasing power of money at such a time means actual loss of wages to the extent of the diminution in the purchasing power of the circulating medium. But this is not all. His savings, whether in bank or benefit society or life insurance, shrink in exactly the same manner. These savings are out in the form of leans sayings, whether in bank or benefit society or life insurance, shrink in exactly the same manner. These sayings are out in the form of loans, repayable in the legal tender of the land, and will always be repaid in the cheapest legal tender. The effect therefore of debasing the money of the country is to rob the most deserving and industrious portion of the people of a portion of their daily earnings and accumulated savings. It is estimated that the accumulation of the people in savings-banks, benefit funds, and life insurance exceeds $3,000,000,000; debasement in the currency to the extent of 15 per cent. means, therefore, a loss of $450,000,000, which will practically be transferred from the earnings and savings of the producing classes, the widows, orphans, and helpless mem-

savings of the producing classes, the widows, orphans, and helpless members of the community, to the pockets of those who have borrowed the money in gold or its equivalent, and will return it in 85-cent legal-tender silver coin, if its production be continued so long as to drive gold out of circulation.

Does any man doubt that this result will follow from the continued coinage of silver? As surely as the pouring of water into a vessel will drive out the air just so surely will silver coin, or its representative in drive out the air just so surely will silver coin, or its representative in the form of silver certificates, drive gold out of circulation.

This continued coinage of silver is advocated by some gentlemen on the theory that it will make money plenty. This view proceeds upon the idea that the community will use an unlimited quantity of money; whereas the fact is that only so much money will be used as is necessary to make the daily exchanges, and the surplus if any lies idle. It will not be given away, nor will it be loaned upon securities that are not regarded as available. Hence to-day, with an excess of money greater than has ever been known in the financial world, it lies idle in the money centers, and is just as hard to procure elsewhere as it was prior money centers, and is just as hard to procure elsewhere as it was prior to the existence of the excess

When, therefore, silver coinage has been carried so far that it can no longer be exchanged for gold, as heretofore it has been by the practical redemption of the silver dollars with gold dollars at the United States custom-houses, where they are receivable in lieu of gold, then the intrinsic value of the silver dollar will assert itself, and gold will go to a corresponding premium.

The first effect will be a temporary contraction of the currency, whereby business will be deranged, and then a steady advance in the prices of all commodities, but not in the wages of labor, corresponding to the silver standard. Thus will occur the transfer of $400,000,000 to $500,000,000 of property from those who have earned and saved it to the pockets of those who have borrowed it. The result will be ruin to many, and a scandal to all who love justice.

Now, what possible justification can be offered for persisting in a course which must surely end in such a disgraceful and ruinous catastrophe? The object is to restore bimetallism throughout the civilized world; that is, to return to the old fixed ratio of 15½ to 1 between silver and gold. If this result could be accomplished the prospect might justify great risks. But what prospect is there of such a result? Alone, it is confessed by the enlightened advocates of bimetallism all over the world, we can not succeed. We have tried it alone and failed. We have simply made a market for the silver which other nations have desired to sell. Since we began, instead of advancing in price, it has fallen in value from 55 pence to 48 pence per ounce. Indeed, it is absurd to suppose that the coinage of $24,000,000 a year could affect the price of $6,000,000,000 of silver, which is the estimated stock in the world. With help and universal agreement success might be attainable. But who will help us? We have tried to get co-operation and have failed. One resource only is left to us; that is, to suspend the coinage of silver temporarily, and try further negotiations. I have myself no hope that such negotiations will succeed, but it is certain that there is no possibility of success until we stop the coinage of silver and force England, France, and Germany to face the consequences of the depreciation of silver in their oriental transactions.

For those who desire bimetallism this is the only possible chance. For those who believe as I do, that silver will henceforth occupy a subsidiary place in the money of the world, the suspension of silver coinage is a necessity in order to avoid greater evils, a more serious derangement of business, and an indefinite postponement to the revival of business, which can not occur until this disturbing cause, unsettling the measure of all values, shall be removed. As matters now stand there is no light from any quarter. There is plenty of idle capital but no confidence. There is plenty of idle machinery but no demand for its products. There is plenty of idle labor but no demand for its employ-nature, and yet we are hungry and naked and cold, perishing in the midst of abundance. The suspenion of the coinage of silver will do more, in my opinion, to bring this deplorable condition of things to an end, in this country at least, than any other remedy which I can

The Speedy Delivery of Letters.

SPEECH

HON. CHARLES R. SKINNER,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 13, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 8138) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

Mr. SKINNER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I desire to call the attention of this committee to the importance of the section of the bill now under consideration, and to give some reasons why it should become law. Sections 3, 4, 5, and 6 of the bill, embodying H. R. 1071 introduced by me at the opening of this Congress, and favorably reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, is as follows:

SECTION 3. That a special stamp of the face valuation of 10 cents may be provided and issued, whenever deemed advisable or expedient, in such form and bearing such device as may meet the approval of the Postmaster-General, which, when attached to a letter, in addition to the lawful postage thereon, the delivery of which is to be at a free-delivery office, or at any city, town, or village containing a population of 4,000 or over, according to the last Federal census, shall be regarded as entitling such letter to immediate delivery within the carrier limit of any free-delivery office which may be designated by the Postmaster-General as a special-delivery office, or within one mile of the post-office at any other office coming within the provisions of this section which may in like manner be designated as a special-delivery office.

SEC. 4. That such specially stamped letter shall be delivered from 7 o'clock a.

m, up to 12 o'clock midnight at offices designated by the Postmaster-General under section 1 of this act.

SEC. 5. That to provide for the immediate delivery of letters bearing the special stamp the postmaster at any office which may come within the provisions of this act may, with the approval of the Postmaster-General, employ such person or persons as may actually be required for such service, who, upon the delivery of such letter, will produre a receipt from the party addressed, or some one authorized to receive it, in a book to be furnished for the purpose, which shall, when not in use, be kept in the post-office, and at all times subject to examination by an inspector of the Department.

SEC. 6. That to provide for the payment of such persons as may be employed for this service the postmaster at any office designated by section 1 of this act shall keep a record of the number of letters received at such office bearing such special stamp, which number shall correspond with the number entered in the receipt-books heretofore specified; and at the end of each month he may pay to such person or persons employed a sum not exceeding 80 per cent. of the face value of all such stamps received and recorded during that month: Provided, That in no case shall the compensation so paid to any one person exceed $80 per month: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall in any way interfere with the prompt delivery of letters as now provided by law or regulation of the Post-Office Department.

Some of the reasons advanced in favor of this provision are given in a report made February 12, 1884, by instruction of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, which report is as follows:

THE SPEEDY DELIVERY OF LETTERS.

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. 1971) to provide for the more speedy delivery of letters at free-delivery offices, and a special stamp to insure said delivery, respectfully submit the following report:

The committee has carefully considered the provisions contained in the bill named, and submit herewith a substitute therefor, of which the following is a synopsis:

Section 1 provides that a special stamp of the face value of 10 cents may be issued whenever deemed advisable or expedient by the Postmaster-General. Whenever such stamp shall be attached to a letter in addition to the lawful postage thereon it shall be regarded as entitling said letter to immediate delivery within the carrier limit of any free-delivery post-office, whenever said office may be designated by the Postmaster-General as a special-delivery office, or within one mile of the post-office at any other city, town, or village containing a population of 4,000 or over, as determined by the last Federal census, whenever the said office is in like manner designated as a special-delivery office.

Section 2 provides that said specially stamped letter shall be delivered from o'clock a. m. up to 12 o'clock midnight at offices designated under provisions

Section 2 provides that said specially stamped letter shall be delivered from 7 o'clock a. m. up to 12 o'clock midnight at offices designated under provisions of section 1.

Section 3 provides that such persons as are actually needed to deliver such specially stamped letters may, upon the approval of the Postmaster-General, be employed by postmasters at properly designated post-offices, who shall take a proper receipt upon the delivery of letters.

Section 4 provides for the payment of such persons employed in the following manner: Postmasters at special-delivery post-offices shall keep a record of the number of specially stamped letters received during each month, which number shall correspond with the number received in the receipt-books prescribed in section 1, and may pay to persons employed in this service a sum not exceeding 80 per cent. of the face value of the stamps so received and recorded each month, but in no case shall the compensation exceed $30 per month for each person.

By the provisions of section 4 it is rendered absolutely certain that the system proposed by the bill will prove itself self-supporting. Wherever a small number of such letters are received at any office, the compensation will be regulated by the number of specially stamped letters delivered, and not more than 80 per cent. of the face valuation of stamps received and recorded. This will leave a margin of 20 per cent. for the expense of preparing stamps and receipt-books. Wherever a large number are received and delivered at large post-offices, the compensation shall not exceed $30 per month. Section 4 also provides that nothing in the proposed act shall interfere with the prompt delivery of letters according to the present free-delivery system as prescribed by law or regulation.

The committee believe that the provisions of the bill. how presented have removed all reasonable objections which were urged against the bill heretofore considered. The bill is not designed to benefit any one city, but directly or indirectly every post-the service to send a letter to that point. It therefore follows that the beneats will be enlarged and extended as the number of special-delivery offices is increased.

It may be called an innovation, but every step which has been taken to improve and enlarge the postal system of the country, by adding facilities or removing obstructions, may have as justly been thus classified. The issue of the first postage-stamp was an innovation, but its issue proved the wisdom of the suggestion. The disuse of the old regulation which required a post bill to be sent with each letter, and the sending of transcripts of all such bills quarterly to the Post-Office Department, was an experiment, but it proved labor-saving, economical, and convenient, and greatly hastened correspondence. The establishment of the registered-letter system, the money-order system, the free-delivery system, the postal-note system were all innovations in one sense, but experience has proved that they were great public wants which have proved more than self-sustaining, and they have all contributed largely to the convenience of the public, and to the perfection of the postal system. The reduction of letter-postage from 3 to 2 cents, less than a year ago, was an experiment, but it has pleasantly disappointed all fears respecting the inroads of the change upon the revenues of the Government, and little doubt is now expressed that the Post-Office Department will still prove self-sustaining notwithstanding the reduction.

of letter-postage from 3 to 2 cents, less than a year ago, was an experiment, but it has pleasantly disappointed all fears respecting the inroads of the change upon the revenues of the Government, and little doubt is now expressed that the Post-Office Department will still prove self-sustaining notwithstanding the reduction.

The fullest discretion is given the Post-Office Department in inaugurating or extending the service proposed by this bill, and it contains no compulsory provision as to its establishment or continuance. Every precaution is taken, also, to render the system absolutely self-supporting, and the committee believe that when the system is nonce established and its advantages are fully understood it will yield a handsome revenue to the Government even at a greatly reduced rate, and the Government will be asked to extend the advantages offered generally throughout the country.

In this connection the committee submitthe following extract from the report of the First Assistant Postmaster-General touching this matter:

"In view of the large excess of postage on local matter alone over the entire cost of the service ($1,021,894.01), and in view of the fact that experience has demonstrated that local correspondence is increased in proportion, especially in the large cities, and hence the postage on local matter in proportion to the facilities given, I have no hesitation in recommending its extension, nor in advising liberal appropriations to bring it up to the highest practicable standard in cities where it is now in operation.

"As stated in my last report, this service meets the general demands of business and social life, but fails to meet the dispatch required in the delivery of letters of exceptional importance.

"Letters are now delivered by carriers at stated hours during the day from about 7 a. m. to 6p. m., the frequency of trips warying in different cities, and also frequent in the surburban districts. Between these deliveries two or three hours frequently intervene in the large cities priva

It will thus be seen that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads guarded the bill against misconception of its purpose or misconstruction of its application.

The system proposed certainly presents these advantages:

1. It will not cost the Government anything, but will most assuredly vield a profit.

2. It will not cost any individual anything who does not care to take advantage of its privileges.

3. Its expense will fall solely upon those who use it.

APPROVED BY THE PRESIDENT.

In his message to Congress at the opening of the present session, December 1, 1884, the President of the United States said:

cember 1, 1884, the President of the United States said:

The free-delivery system has been lately applied to five cities, and the total number of offices in which it is now in operation is one hundred and fifty-nine. Experience shows that its adoption under proper conditions, is equally an accommodation to the public and an advantage to the postal service. It is more than self-sustaining, and for the reasons urged by the Postmaster-General may properly be extended.

In the opinion of that officer it is important to provide means whereby exceptional dispatch in dealing with letters in free-delivery offices may be secured by payment of extraordinary postage. This scheme might be made effective by employment of a special stamp whose cost should be commensurate with the expense of the extra service.

In some of the large cities private express companies have undertaken to outstrip the Government mail-carriers by affording, for the prompt transmission of letters, better facilities than have hitherto been at the command of the Post-Office.

It has always been the policy of the Government to descript the services of the extraordinary of the Government to the proper transmission of letters, better facilities than have hitherto been at the command of the Post-Office.

Office.

It has always been the policy of the Government to discourage such enterprises, and in no better mode can that policy be maintained than in supplying the public with the most efficient mail service that, with due regard to its own best interests, can be furnished for its accommodation.

RECOMMENDED BY THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

In the report of the Postmaster-General for 1884 (page 13) that officer, who certainly has been in a position for many years to make a close study of the question, says in reference to a

SPECIAL STAMP FOR SPECIAL DELIVERY.

The necessity and demand in cities for prompt transmission and delivery of letters passing between business men and others has resulted in the establishment, in many places, of what may be termed letter-express companies, which, by the employment of messenger boys, are enabled greatly to facilitate intercourse of this character among merchants, professional persons, and others engaged in active life. It is done at a small expense and with so much system and promptness as seriously to diminish the revenues of the Department at several letter-carrier offices.

The patronage which is extended to these companies affords evidence that the free-delivery system, notwithstanding its facilities and benefits, has not progressed so far as to meet all the wants of energetic business life in large commercial cities. Therefore further improvement of the service in this particular should, in my judgment, be attempted, not only to prevent a loss of revenue, but with a purpose to make it as useful as possible. I am of opinion that the public have a right to expect that this Department should make the same effort to serve them promptly and faithfully in the transmission and delivery of letters as is done by private parties.

I know of no way in which this can be better accomplished than by the use of a special postage-stamp for letters mailed and intended for special and prompt delivery at free-delivery offices. This stamp should be of the denomination of 10 cents, and, when affixed to a letter, in addition to the proper postage charge, should insure for it as speedy a delivery as possible after its reception at any letter-carrier office. This outside distribution could be effected by employing messenger boys, at a small salary, and in such numbers as the circumstances should warrant. I am satisfied such an effort to accommodate the public would still further commend the free-delivery service to its patrons in the large cities where it is in operation.

HEARTILY INDORSED.

HEARTILY INDORSED.

This provision then comes before us approved by the President, recommended by the Postmaster-General, and indorsed by two of the prominent standing committees of this House—the Committee on Appropriations, always careful, watchful, and conservative, and the Committee on the Post-Office and Post Roads—before whom it was considered patiently and critically. With these indorsements there should not be an objection to it or a vote against it.

I do not like to leave this subject without referring in this public manner to the interest manifested in this whole subject by Mr. Joseph S. Fay, of Boston, Mass. Among his many letters of interest and advice, I desire to append the following:

MAGNOLIA, FLA., January 28, 1884.

vice, I desire to append the following:

My Dear Sir: Professor Baird, of the Smithsonian Institution, has sent me a copy of a bill introduced by you "to provide for the more speedy delivery of letters," &c. This matter has been the subject of much conference between Professor Baird and me for a dozen years or more, and up to the present year I have vainly called official attention to it. It was noticed by Postmaster-General Ramsey, who asked how it could be done, and I answered by giving him just about the scheme which you embody in your bill in very concise, definite, and business-like terms, and that was the last I heard of it. I had renewed the agitation by addressing Postmaster-General Gresham, and, through a friend, Assistant Postmaster-General Hatton, and I am very glad you have taken the matter up so promptly and efficiently. It will be one of the most popular enactments possible if passed. It does not go far enough, and to be the most popular act ever passed it should embrace all post-offices as well as those of free delivery. The large profit on 10 cents in the cities would more than pay any loss on the less frequent country deliveries, and it would be a great boon to the people at large.

In Great Britain all letters are delivered free in the regular rounds of the postmen, but no country has yet adopted the special delivery of letters as soon as received at the office addressed. The United States will take the lead in this. Your bill, though limited in its operation, is a step in the right direction, and if adopted and passed by Congress I predict that the experiment will be so successful that its extension to every post-office will soon follow.

I am here for a few weeks for my health, but my usual winter residence is in Boston, in summer at Wood's Holl, where at that season Professor Baird is located with the Fish Commission.

With no more interest than others in the measure you have so intelligently brought forward, I thank you sincerely for your part in its promotion for myself and in behalf of t

Power to Originate Revenue Bills.

SPEECH

HON. JOHN D. WHITE,

OF KENTUCKY.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 23, 1885,

On the following resolution, offered by Mr. Hurd:

"Whereas certain bills appropriating money from the Treasury of the United States, originating in the Senate, have passed that body and have been sent to this House for its concurrence, which are now upon the Speaker's table, to wit, Senate bill No. 398, entitled 'A bill to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools,' and many others; and

"Whereas it is asserted that these bills are in violation of the privilege of this House to exclusively originate bills for raising revenue: Therefore,

"Bett resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be hereby directed to inquire into the power of the Senate to originate bills appropriating money from the Treasury of the United States, and report to this House at as early a day as practicable. And said committee shall have leave to report at any time."

Mr. WHITE of Ventralry, said:

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, said:
Mr. SPEAKER: It is rather late in the session for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Hurd] to ask the House to call on the Judiciary Committee to define the words "raising revenue" as they occur in article 1, section 7, clause 3, and page 5 of the Constitution. His eloquent speech has the appearance of a premeditated and premature attack upon the Blair educational bill.

That bill is an effort in the right direction to dispel the dark cloud of ignorance which is not confined to any race nor any section of the United States. Its passage is demanded by the best interests of our common states. Its passage is demanded by the best interests of our common country. Until now the greatest opposition has come from the localities intended to be most benefited. The resolution before us, if carried, will tend to defeat the bill making an appropriation to supplement the common-school fund of the several States. You have the Democratic majority here to pass the resolution, but I desire to remind gentlemen on that side of the House that in the Democratic national platform adopted July 10, 1884, at Chicago will be found the declaration that your party believes in "a free ballot and a fair count," also in "the diffusion of free believes in "a free ballot and a fair count," also in "the diffusion of free education by common schools, so that every child in the land may be taught the rights and duties of citizenship." Was that mere buncombe? The Republican party is committed to national aid to common schools for the benefit of all classes of society. We have an abundance in the Treasury and its expenditure is demanded by the great bulk of the people for the intellectual development of illiterate white and colored citizens more than for any other one purpose. Our future prosperity as a virtuous and intelligent people depends in a great measure upon the fate of the principle adopted by the Senate in the passage of the Blair bill, which appropriates $77,000,000 of the people's money for the education of the children throughout the land in the common schools of the several States.

eral States.

As bearing on this subject, I append to my remarks the very instructive article on "The Freedman's case in equity," by Mr. George W. Cable, published in the January number of The Century for this year, to which I invite careful attention:

ble, published in the January number of The Century for this year, to which I invite careful attention:

The greatest social problem before the American people to-day is, as it has been for a hundred years, the presence among us of the negro.

No comparable entanglement was ever drawn round itself by any other modern nation with so serene a disregard of its ultimate issue, or with a more distinct national responsibility. The African slave was brought here by cruel force, and with everybody's consent except his own. Everywhere the practice was favored as a measure of common aggrandizement. When a few men and women protested they were mobbed in the public interest, with the public consent. There rests, therefore, a moral responsibility on the whole nation never to lose sight of the results of African-American slavery until they cease to work mischief and injustice.

It is true these responsibilities may not fall everywhere with the same weight; but they are nowhere entirely removed. The original seed of trouble was sown with the full knowledge and consent of the nation. The nation was to blame; and so long as evils spring from it, their correction must be the nation's duty.

The late Southern slave has within two decades risen from slavery to freedom, from freedom to citizenship, passed on into political ascendency, and fallen again from that eminence. The amended Constitution holds him up in his new political rights as well as a mere constitution can. On the other hand certain enactments of Congress, trying to reach further, have lately been made void by the highest court of the nation. And another thing has happened. The popular mind in the old free States, weary of strife at arm's-length, bewildered by its complications, vexed by many a blunder, eager to turn to the cure of other evils, and even tinctured by that race feeling whose grosser excesses it would so gladly see suppressed, has retreated from its uncomfortable dictatorial attitude and thrown the whole matter over to the States of the South. Here it re inferior race, is drawing near a second seed-time. For this is what the impatient proposal to make it a dead and buried issue really means. It means to recommit it to the silence and concealment of the covered furrow. Beyond that incubative retirement no suppressed moral question can be pushed; but all such questions, ignored in the domain of private morals, spring up and expand once more into questions of public equity; neglected as matters of public equity they yield the red fruits of revolution. There must arise, nay, there has arisen in the South itself, a desire to see established the equities of the issue to make it no longer a question of endurance between one group of States and another, but between the moral dibris of an exploded evil and the duty, necessity, and value of planting society firmly upon universal justice and equity. In the substance of the society of the substance of the substance of the society of the substance of the substance of the Southern States sity, and value of planting society firmly upon universal justice and equity, necessity, and value of planting society firmly upon universal justice and equity, necessity, and value of planting society firmly upon universal justice and equity, necessity, and value of planting society firmly upon universal justice and equity, necessity, and value of planting society firmly upon universal justice and equity, necessity, and value of planting society firmly upon universal justice and equity, necessity, and the substance of the Southern States sity, and value of the substance of the Southern States sity, and value of the substance of the Southern States in the substance of the Southern States in the substance of the Southern States and the errors that are being committed against them.

If we take up this mask, the difficulties of the situation are plain, We have, always called themselves the community; second, the removal of the entire political machinery by which this forcing process was effected; and, third, these revisions leaf the substance o threw him into loathsome jails as a common felon for returning to his native land.

It will be wise to remember that these were the acts of an enlightened, Godfearing people, the great mass of whom have passed beyond all earthly accountability. They were our fathers. I am the son and grandson of slave-holders. These were their faults; posterity will discover ours; but these things must be frankly, fearlessly taken into account if we are ever to understand the true interest of our peculiar state of society.

Why, then, did this notion that the man of color must always remain an allen stand so unshaken? We may readily recall how, under ancient systems, he rose not only to high privileges, but often to public station and power. Singularly, with us the trouble lay in a modern principle of liberty. The whole idea of American government rested on all men's equal, inalienable right to secure their life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness by governments founded in their own consent. Hence, our Southern forefathers, shedding their blood, or ready to shed it, for this principle, yet proposing in equal good conscience to continue holding the American black man and mulatto and quadroon in slavery, had to anchor that conscience, their conduct, and their laws in the conviction that the man of African tincture was, not by his master's arbitrary assertion merely, but by nature and unalterably, an alien. If that hold should break, one single wave of irresistible inference would lift our whole Southern social fabric and dash it upon the rocks of negro emancipation and enfranchisement. How was it made secure? Not by books, though they were written among us from every possible point of view, but, with the mass of our slave-owners, by the calm hypothesis of a postive, intuitive knowledge. To them the statement was an axiom. They abandoned the methods of moral and intellectual reasoning, and fell back upon this assumption of a God-given instinct, nobler than reason, and which it was an insult to a freeman to ask him to prove on l

Yet it was found not enough. The slave multiplied. Slavery was a dangerous institution. Few in the South to-day have any just idea how often the slave plotted for his freedom. Our Southern ancestors were a noble, manly people, springing from some of the most highly intelligent, aspiring, upright, and refined nations of the modern world; from the Huguenot, the French chevalier, the Old Englander, the New Englander. Their acts were not always right; whose are? But for their peace of mind they had to believe them so. They therefore spoke much of the negro's contentment with that servile condition for which nature had designed him. Yet there was no escaping the knowledge that we dared not trust the slave caste with any power that could be withheld from them. So the perpetual alien was made also a perpetual menial, and the belief became fixed that this too was nature's decree, not ours.

Thus we stood at the close of the civil war. There were always a few Southerners who did not justify slavery, and many who cared nothing whether it was just or not. But what we have described was the general sentiment of good Southern people. There was one modifying sentiment. It related to the slave's spiritual interests. Thousands of pious masters and mistresses flatly broke the shameful laws that stood between their slaves and the Bible. Slavery was right; but religion, they held, was for the alien and menial as well as for the citizen and master. They could be alien and citizen, menial and master, in church as well as out; and they were.

Yet over against this lay another root of to-day's difficulties. This perpetuation of the alien, menial relation tended to perpetuate the vices that naturally cling to servility, dense ignorance, and a hopeless separation front true liberty; and as we could not find it in our minds to blame slavery with this perpetuation, we could only assume as a further axiom that there was, by nature, a disqualifying moral taint in every drop of negro blood. The testimony of an Irish, German, Italian, French, or Spanish beggar in a court of justice was taken on its merits; but the colored man's was excluded by law wherever it weighed against a white man. The colored man was a prejudged culprit. The discipline of the plantation required that the difference between master and slave be never lost sight of by either. It made our master caste a soild mass, and fixed a common masterhood and subserviency between the ruling and the serving race.* Every one of us grew up in the idea that he had, by birth and race, certain broad powers of police over any and every person of color.

All at once the tempest of war snapped off at the ground every one of these arbitrary relations, without removing a single one of the sentiments in which they stood rooted. Then, to fortify the freedman in the tenure of his new rights he was given the ballot. Before this grim fact the notion of allenism, had it been standing alone, might have given way. The idea that slavery was right did begin to crumble almost at once. "As for slavery," said an old Creole sugar-plan id:

"I am a Southerner;
I love the South; I dared for her
To fight from Lookout to the sea,
With her proud banner over me:
But from my lips thanksgiving broke,
As God in battle-thunder spoke,
And that Black Idol, breeding drouth
And dearth of human sympathy
Throughout the sweet and sensuous South,
Was, with its chains and human yoke,
Blown hellward from the cannon's mouth,
While Freedom cheered behind the smoke!"†

Throughout the sweet and sensuous South.

Wais, with its chains and human yoke,
Blown hellward from the cannon's mouth.

With like readiness might the old alien relation have given way if we could only, while letting that pass, have held fast by the other old deas. But they were all bound together. See our embarrassment. For more than a hundred years we have made these sentiments the absolute essentials to our self-respect. And yet if we clung to them, how could we meet the freedman on equal terms in the political field? Even to lead would not compensate us; for the fundamental professision of American politics is that the leader is servant to his followers. It was too much. The ex-master and ex-slave—the quarter-deck and the forecastle, as it were—could not come together. But neither could the American mind tolerate a continuance of martial law. The agonies of reconside, and whipping and killing on the other, were but huge accidents of the siduation. The two main questions were really these: on the freedman's side how to establish republican State government under the same recognition of his rights that the rest of Christendom accorded him; and on the former master's side, how to get back to the old semblance of republican State government, and—allowing that the freedman was de facto a voter—still to maintain a purely arbitrary superiority of all whites over all blacks, and a purely arbitrary equality of all blacks among themselves as an alien, menial, and dangerous class.

Exceptionally here and there some one in the master caste did throw off the as a leader by the newly liberated thousands around him. But justas promptly the old master race branded him also an alien reprobate, and in ninely-nine cases out of a hundred, if he had not already done so, he soon began to confirm by his actions the brand on his check. However, we need give no history here of the dreadful episode of reconstruction. Under an experimentative true its issues rest to-day upon the pledge of th rags, with vile odors and the clanking of shackles and chains, nine penitentiary convicts chained to one chain, and ten more chained to another, dragged laboriously into the compartment of the car where in one corner sat this mother and child, and packed it full and the train moved on. The keeper of the convicts told me he should take them in that car two hundred miles that night. They were going to the mines. My seat was not in that car, and I staid in it but a moment. It stank insufferably. I returned to my own place in the coach behind, where there was, and had all the time been, plenty of room. But the mother and child sat on in silence in that foul hole, the conductor having distinctly refused them admission elsewhere because they were of African blood, and not because the mother was, but because she was not, engaged at the moment in menial service. Had the child been white, and the mother not its natural but its hired guardian, she could have sat anywhere in the train, and no one would have ventured to object, even had she been as black as the mouth of the coal-pit to which her loathsome follow-passengers were being carried in chains.

SPEECH

HON. RICHARD GUENTHER,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, February 25, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. GUENTHER said:

Mr. Chairman: I am not in favor of placing the improvements of rivers and harbors entirely under the control of the military branch of the Government by dismissing all the civil engineers now employed and replacing them by the lieutenants and captains of the Army. Mr. Chairman, I do not deem such a step one in the direction of progress, but rather the opposite. I do not think it would be in the interest of economy, but rather the reverse. It would, in my opinion, demoralize the whole Engineer Department by removing many gentlemen now employed upon the works of improving rivers and harbors, men who now perform a great deal of the brain-work, who furnish practical experience the men who were educated as civil engineers-and supplanting them by the graduates of West Point, not even officers of the Engineer Corps, the graduates of West Point, not even officers of the Engineer Corps, who, I grant, may be all good soldiers and first-class Army engineers, but who in the nature of things are not the best qualified to carry on great feats of hydrographic and civil engineering. I am in favor of a strict separation of the military and civil branches of the Government. My aim is to make our Army and Navy officers the peers of any in the world with reference to their specific calling. But, on the other hand, I want to make our public service as perfect as possible and completely free from military interference. For the problematic saving of $400,000, or even a good deal more, I am unwilling, if I can prevent it, to continue the anomaly of having the military assume or encroach more and more upon the civil branches, or what should be essentially a civil branch of Government.

Would you like to go back to the time before 1863 and place the Suervising Architect's office again under the charge of an officer of the Engineer Corps? Look at the public buildings erected before 1863, at their monotonous uniformity, their lack of architectural beauty, and compare them with similar structures built since that time. Mr. Chairman, this proposition intends to remove all the assistant engineers, all of whom are civilians.

Go through the whole list and you will find that the assistant engineers are not officers of the Army, are not graduates of West Point. Take the defenses of the Penobscot and Kennebec Rivers, Portland Harbor, and the navy-yard at Kittery, Me., and Portsmouth, N. H., improvement of rivers and harbors in the States of Maine and New Hampshire, and you find that while the officer in charge is an officer of the Corps of Engineers, a graduate of West Point, his assistant is a civilian and the draughtsman. The defenses of Boston and the navy-yard at Charlestown and improvement of rivers and harbors on the eastern coast of Massachusetts are in charge of an Army officer; his three assistants are civilians. The fort at Willets Point and Fort Schuyler, East River, New York, are in charge of a lieutenant-colonel in the Army; his assistant is a civilian; and so on through the whole list.

The Corps of Engineers, all of whom were appointed from the Mili-The Corps of Engineers, an of whom were appointed from the Mintary Academy, comprising the Chief of Engineers, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, majors, captains, first lieutenants, and second lieutenants, consists of one hundred and six officers. There are on the temporary roll, according to the Blue Book of 1883, the only one at my disposal, two assistant engineers; one at $4,200, the other at a salary of $3,600 per annum. They are civilians, residents of Washington, D. C. Why are they employed? Simply because they can not be spared. The number of excitent prepared on the various inverse. they employed? Simply because they can not be spared. The number of assistant engineers, civilians, employed on the various improvements, with salaries from $100 to $250 per month, is two hundred and twenty-seven. You propose to turn out these two hundred and twenty-seven civil engineers and substitute in their places—whom? Army, officers. You could not fill their positions by the members of the Corps of United States Engineers, because they are already employed; and besides, there are only one hundred and six.

You propose to take two hundred and six.

You propose to take two hundred and twenty-seven officers from the Army, believing them to be competent to take the places of men who have devoted their life exclusively to the study of civil engineering, while these graduates of West Point for a few years while at the academy got a smattering of it, and since did not pay any attention to it at all.

You may just as well fill the places on the bench with graduates of West Point, for law is one of their studies. You have at the academy, three professors of civil and military engineering and two professors of law. The course at the academy comprises tactics, with seven in-structors; civil and military engineering, with three professors; natural structors; civil and military engineering, with three professors; natural and experimental philosophy, with three professors; mathematics, with nine professors; history, geography, and ethics, with two professors; chemistry, mineralogy, and geology, with four professors; modern languages, with seven professors; law, with two professors; practical military engineering, military signaling, and telegraphy, with two instructors; ordnance and gunnery, with two instructors; drawing, with

There are in the Engineer Department forty-eight draughtsmen, with salaries from $100 to $150 per month, not one a graduate from West Point. Why have they not been employed in that capacity, having had instruction in drawing by four professors? The reason is that they are not proficient, not having even attained that grade of perfection necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of a draughtsman.

I should be in favor of transferring the business of improving our rivers and harbors with reference to navigation to a civil department. It does not seem necessary, to my mind, that the luster of the Army officers should be thrown around the business of civil engineering.

I do not think that the best interests of this country demand that the 4,500 persons, non-civilians, employed in the improvements of rivers and harbors should be bossed by one hundred and six Army officers; that from ten to eighteen millions of dollars per annum should be expended under the control of these one hundred and six shoulder-strapped aristocrats. Keep them in their proper sphere, educate them for the purposes of a military career but do not let them encroach upon the civil branches of life. Not even in Germany, in the country of military despotism, where man begins with the lieutenant in the army, are public works for the improvement of rivers and harbors for commercial public works for the improvement of rivers and harbors for commercial and navigation purposes carried on by them, but by competent civil engineers, who had special training in their line and who devoted themselves solely to the study of their profession as civil engineers.

It is time for us to do away with the traditions of the past. If we can not employ the graduates of West Point for military purposes only, restrict their number in some way. Employ them, if you please, in the War Department in a clerical capacity, or let them do such engineering work as they are capable of, where they can make themselves useful in time of peace without detriment to the public service, but do not place them in positions for which civilians are much better qualified. In time of peace without detriment to the public service, but do not place them in positions for which civilians are much better qualified, and where, by reason of their lack of experience and proper training, they would waste much more of the people's money than their salaries would amount to were they kept on waiting orders. Do not establish a rule which would prevent us from availing ourselves of the services of the best engineering talent at our command and confining ourselves to the mediocrity of the Army and placing a civil branch of this Government entirely in the hands of overbearing martinets who usually look upon the civilians as inferior beings and who, in the security of life positions and pensions, of promotion not based upon true merit but on length of service, lack the stimulus that prompts men in civil life to excel; that ambition to work their way to the top of the ladder in their chosen profession on their own merits by hard work and incessant

Let us look for the bright flowers of civil-engineering genius, talent, and skill in the sunshine of civil, rather than in the cold, somber shades of military life.

Aid to Education.

SPEEUH

HON. THOMAS J. WOOD.

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 13, 1885,

On the educational bills before Congress.

Mr. WOOD said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The Blair and Willis educational bills provide that certain sums of money shall be distributed to the several States of the Union in proportion to illiteracy of the people in each of them. The provisions of these bills do not interfere with the educational system of any State, but direct that the money shall be used for educational purposes by aiding the common schools therein.

The troublesome question is the power of Congress to pass one of these bills. There is no express power in any provision of the Constitution authorizing Congress to enact a law for the purpose stated in either of them.

The several powers of the Constitution are-

First. Express powers. Second. Implied powers. Third. Incidental powers. Fourth. Inherent power.

There is no controversy about the first power. I hold that Congress has power to pass one of these educational bills under any one of the other three powers. I will consider them in their order.

As to the second power I say there is not in the whole Constitution a grant of powers which does not draw after it other powers not expressed, but essential and vital to their exercise; not independent but auxiliary to the grant itself. No provision of the Constitution expressly excludes implied and incidental powers as did the Articles of Confederation. This subject is well considered in the Federalist, where cogent reasoning is applied to it.

What is the grant of power in the Constitution bearing upon the subject of these bills? Section 4 of the fourth article of the Constitution

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

Here is a naked declaration of power. No way is pointed out, no means are defined to inform Congress how this power shall be executed. Now, every means that can be used consistent with the power to carry it into effect is implied from the nature of the original grant. Congress may adopt proper means to carry into effect this express power, whether it be military forces, peace commissioners, or by a compromise of the complaints of the people of the State against a republican form of government.

Many reasons might be assigned why the people of a State would not desire to maintain a republican form of government, but one strong one, among all others, might be that the people through ingnorance were incapable of self-government; incapable by illiteracy of participating in the affairs of the State through the exercise of suffrage.

pating in the affairs of the State through the exercise of suffrage.

If general ignorance is the cause Congress may exercise power to remove it, though years are required to do so, by liberal grants of money for the purpose of diffusing general intelligence and thereby creating respect among the people for a government republican in form, and a decent regard for the rights of mankind.

The Indians are incapable of self-government through illiteracy, and no republican form of government would be maintained by them, and now the Government is providing, as it has often done, for their education and mental elevation in order to make them law-abiding and supplies of self-government, and therefore fit to live under and supplies of self-government, and therefore fit to live under and supplies of self-government. and capable of self-government, and therefore fit to live under and support a republican form of government in the State where they may re-

It is conceded that the colored people as a body in the South, where large numbers congregate, are incapable of understanding and maintaining a republican form of government in the absence of intelligent white people.

In such cases Congress may exercise the power to promote intelligence and education among them in order to make them self-governing, and and education among them in order to make them self-governing, and therefore capable of maintaining independently of the power of the General Governmenta republican form of government. If general illiteracy among the people of a State is the cause of the failure of a republican form of government, Congress may donate money to remove the cause through educational means, and that is true where illiteracy is so dominant as to constitute a balance of power against intelligence or is a standing menace to the safety of the Commonwealth.

In such cases Congress may provide means to remove the cause and all threatening danger to a republican form of government. What is a grant of power without the employment of means necessary to its exe-grant of power without the employment of means necessary to its execution? The axiom is clearly established in law and in reason that whatever is required to be done the means to that end are authorized. Whenever a general power to do a thing is given every particular power necessary for doing it is given.

Suppose there is universal famine in a State, and the people thereof, starving in all its borders, organize in open rebellion against all State law and constitutional authority and annihilate the republican form of government therein existing?

In such a case Congress could order troops with bayonets, powder, and lead, to reduce the people to submission, or it may appropriate money to buy them bread and thus allay their opposition to State authority, and restore to the State a republican form of government.

There is no defined way to execute this general power of the Constitution. Congress itself is the sole judge of the means necessary to carry into effect this grant of power. Congress is the sole judge of the means necessary to carry into effect any grant of power in the Constitution, provided always that the means employed are properly incident to the express power. No one would claim that means used entirely foreign to the object to execute a power would be a proper execution of it. The manner of carrying into effect the great powers of the Constitution is left to the wisdom and conservative judgment of the legislator where the means of execution are not defined. Otherwise the creation of naked powers would be absurd, as they would remain forever dormant or in a paralytic state. Judge Story, writing on this question, aptly

It would be almost impracticable, if it were not useless, to enumerate the various instances in which Congress, in the progress of the Government, have made use of incidental and implied means to execute its powers. They are almost infinitely varied in their ramifications and details.

But incidental powers are expressly conferred on Congress by the Constitution, and in these words:

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof.

This provision constitutes Congress the judge of what laws are necessary to carry into effect the powers of the Constitution. Although it is surplusage under the reasoning of judicial decisions and eminent writers on constitutional powers, as it existed already as an incident, yet it does prove that the framers of the Constitution intended to leave the means of executing the powers to the deliberate judgment of the legislator.

Then the question is, Is general intelligence and enlightenment of the people supportive of a government republican in form? Does the intelligence of the people aid and maintain such a government? If so,

Congress may adopt measures to that end.

I have briefly discussed the incidental powers of Congress and the implied powers of the Constitution, and I pass on to the inherent power of that instrument. This power sounds strange, but hear me through. In order that the application of this power may be more readily understood I make a statement of facts:

The real purpose of these measures is to provide means for the education of the colored people in the Southern States, although they embrace all classes of illiterate people in every State.

A few years ago 4,000,000 of illiterate colored people were released from slavery and the adult males clothed with all the rights, duties, and conditions of American citizenship. No one pretends that they possessed any mental qualifications to become good citizens and an intelligent factor in the administration of the Government. The old exslaves can not be materially improved, but the young people can be taught the superiority of republican government, the rights and privileges it confers upon the citizen, respect and obedience for the laws of the State and Federal Union.

the State and Federal Union.

What is the foundation of the Federal Union? What is the basis of the General Government? The theory is that it rests only upon the consent of the governed. Who are the governed? I answer, all classes of the people, white and black. The people of their own free will can enlarge or restrict its powers, or change the system entirely, and do so peaceably and rightfully. The people are the sovereign. They rule through their own selected agents, who act by defined official powers. These are responsible to no sovereign save the sovereignty of the people, who hold them accountable for violations of official duties. In a word, the Federal system is in the hands of the people. They control by the elective franchise. Shall it be an intelligent franchise? They maintain it by consent and self-government. Need it be said that such a system of government can only be sustained and perpetuated by the virtue and intelligence of the people, and without which it could not long survive?

Now, there is a large percentage of unintelligent and illiterate people in this country exercising a fundamental power in the enactment and administration of law who can know nothing of the effect or benefit of it. Can they safely and independently execute so great a trust without any intelligent conception of the rights and duties of citizenship? Are they fit to deposit the ballot that may determine the destiny of the Republic? Are they fit to deposit the ballot to determine any policy of the Government? How can they select proper agents to administer the Government when they have no understanding of its powers and purposes? They can not pass judgment upon any policy beneficial or injurious to the commonwealth. This Government has been preserved through the predominance of general intelligence, and all will concede that it would long since have disappeared had ignorance and illiteracy dominated.

There are several hundred thousand of illiterate colored citizens in the Southern States, who were suddenly granted the obligations of citizenship without knowledge of its duties and responsibilities, and the number is increasing. This mass of ignorance, suddenly granted the highest boon in the power of mankind, American citizenship, may join a dangerous crusade against the best interest of the whole country. It is a lurking enemy around the basis of republican institutions, and a powerful element, if left alone, that may strike our federal system and threaten civil liberty. It is a mercenary and menacing power that may be ready to rend the Constitution itself.

I ask, does not the whole Constitution, as a means of government, permit the exercise of power to preserve itself? Can this organic law be dissolved because there is no express power therein given to preserve it against any preconceived contingency? When the foundation of republican government is being undermined, shall we say there is no power given to preserve it? Does not the organization of this Government as a whole carry with it at all times inherent power which may be exercised for its own safety? I answer, is not the power of preservation innate, inwrought in the organization, so as to be inseparable from the Government itself, inseparable as the "inherent qualities of the magnet," inseparable as the inherent rights of men to life and liberty? Is not preservative power so interwoven in the great framework that it can not be excluded? I would say preserve the Constitution and the Federal Government by express powers, if any there be, but if none, still preserve the Government. Though in doing so I employed means not named in the organic laws, yet I would have the Government left to all by the exercise of them.

When the very foundation of this Government, to wit, intelligence and virtue of the people, is being affected by growing illiteracy, can not power be rightfully exercised to prevent its continuance and preserve the structure? The central life of government holds ready all power on earth for its own preservation. All say there is ample power of preservation against all armed warfare. But is it the idea that the only mode of preservation is force, military force? Can not there be peaceful means used to preserve the Government, or is the military force the only one? When the increasing illiterate population, white and black, now numbering over 2,000,000 voters, uniting with powerful factions, give consent for some other worse form of government, then it is too late for peaceful remedies.

The will of the people to dissolve this Government for another is irresistible and there would be no contest about it. If the will of the people is an intelligent one, an enlightened one, the theory is it would stand as the best ever founded by mankind, but an illiterate or ignorant will might destroy the best for the worst ever produced. Warpowers, not given by any law, may be exercised as a state necessity. Peace powers may be assumed as a state necessity, for the Government may be peacefully dissolved as well as forcibly by war. The Government has a right to fortify itself against the attack of growing illiteracy, and in doing so it aids itself. When intelligence is generally diffused the Constitution is aided and strenghtened. Is that a harmful exercise of power? I think not, because it gives me my Government, after its exercise, better founded than it was before, and that can not be a violation of the Constitution.

The manumitted slaves enfranchised forced an unexpected mass of illiteracy into a political power in the affairs of government. It was the result of state necessity, which continues itself to make this new political force an intelligent and supportive power to the Government. We are brought face to face with a proposition that underlies the Government and all its civil institutions. All will admit that class ignorance and general illiteracy is inimical to a government founded on popular intelligence. It has contempt for law and all government policy, and is a sure element of disturbance and destruction wherever found. Men exclaim there is no danger, that the illiterate population is impotent for evil. I answer that the illiterate population of the whole country is a powerful factor for evil. It now holds the balance of political power. The census returns of 1880 show 10,000,000 voters in the United

The census returns of 1880 show 10,000,000 voters in the United States and Territories. The total number over 21 years of age who can not read or write is 4,204,363, of whom 2,056,463 are whites and 2,147,5900 are colored, including 300,000 Indians and 100,000 Asiatics. Assume one-half are females, which leaves over 2,000,000 illiterate voters who can not write their names or read their ballots. The illiterate voters constitute one-fifth of the whole voting population; one voter in five can not read his ballot or write his name. Generally they are in the power of low demagogues, and possess no higher aim than prejudice, jealousy, and revenge. They can not tell the Constitution of their country, if under the eye, from the advertisement of a horse jockey. They know nothing of the laws of the State wherein they reside. To them the Declaration of Independence is a dark blank and the Bill of Rights an enigma. I read a part of the report of the committee on this subject:

The illiterate voters of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Connecticut, of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, in short of every Middle, Southern, and most of the Western States, have power, if combined, to decide any political issue that is now, or for years is likely to be, pending between political parties. They represent ten of our fifty millions of people.

*Including Indians and Asiatics.

The people who intelligently support the General Government have a right to ask aid to arrest the growth of illiteracy. Their social relations, their business affairs, their personal safety are threatened by this element growing in their midst. There was a time when a certain class in Europe and America refused education of their children. Now they ask for it, not only on account of its elevating influence over the vices and on mind and morals, but for the aptitude and intelligence it gives to the manner of labor. They know now that an intelligent labor means quick work, better work, and more work. An intelligent care penter or bricklayer will do more and better work than an ignorant one, command better wages and higher respect of the employer, all of which increases regard and dignity for labor. In every business relation the intelligent laborer is the best and safest employé, makes more for his employer, makes better wages for himself, and is a better citizen. The poor workmen of overcrowded Europe see the preferment of intelligent labor because of correctness of work and the saving of materials to the employer, and are using all means at command to educate their children. The old governments have responded liberally to their call, as I show by the following statistics, beginning with France:

Government aid to primary education.—In 1860 the government aid to primary education amounted to 5,424,036 francs; in 1870 (under the empire), 9,817,513 francs; in 1877 (under the republic), 22,035,760 francs. In 1882 the government aid will be about 50,000,000 francs, in order to enable all the communes to enforce the obligatory school law. In addition to the above amount the departments spend this year 25,000,000 francs, and the communes 60,000,000 francs for primary education. During the two weeks from April 15 to April 30, 1882, the government has spent 1,244,835 francs for new school-houses. The total amount spent by the government aione in 1881–82 for all phases of instruction amounts to 114,353,941 francs, or $22,717,880.

2. BELGIUM.

The following table shows the government grants to education from 1831 to 1882:

TO TOTAL THAT I HAVE BURNESS OF DESIGNATION OF THE PARTY	Francs.
1831	217,000
1843	466,000
1845	711,000
1852	1, 230, 000
1857	1,689,000
1864	3,707,000
1870	6, 525, 000
	11,500,000
	20, 400, 000

The population of Belgium is 5,403,006.

In 1830, when Belgium separated from Holland, there were only 1,146 public primary schools. In 1875, there were 4,152 public primary schools and 2,615 adult schools. In 1874,106 per cent. of the conscripts were illiterate; in 1850, 35.35 per cent.; and in 1878, only 19.59 per cent.

3. ITALY.

Italy has a population of 28,209,620, and a school population (6-12) of 4,527,582. Of this number 2,057,977 attend school, against 1,604,978 in 1879. The number of public elementary schools has risen from 32,782 in 1870 to 41,108 in 1879. The annual grant to these schools in 1882 is 31,000,000 lire ($4,500,000). The 7,422 private elementary schools receive no state aid. In 1873 the government grant was 15,000,000 lire ($3,000,000); in 1876, 29,000,000 lire ($4,000,000); and in 1878, 24,000,000 lire ($4,800,000). This shows an increase of 16,000,000 lire, or $3,200,000

24,000,000 lire ($4,800,000). This shows an increase of 16,000,000 lire, or $3,200,000 since 1873.

The above grants are made in addition to large buildings and gardens given for educational purposes in nearly every city and town of the kingdom. According to the census of 1861, out of a population of 21,777,334, there were 16,999,701 who could neither read nor write—7,889,238 males, and 9,110,463 females.

In 1871, out of a population of 26,801,154, there were 19,533,792 who could neither read nor write.

The present minister of public instruction has taken energetic steps to provide accommodations for all the children of school age, and to enforce the law which makes attendance at school obligatory for all children between the ages of 6 and 12.

4. ENGLAND.

The annual parliamentary grants to elementary schools in England and Wales was: In 1840, £30,000; in 1850, £180,110; in 1858, £688,873; in 1862, £774,743; in 1863, £721,386; in 1866, £649,000; in 1867, £682,201; in 1868, £680,429; in 1869, £840,-711; in 1870, £914,721; in 1873, £1,313,078; in 1875, £1,566,271; in 1877, £2,127,730; in 1879, £2,783,404; in 1882, £2,749,863.

The number of schools has risen from 10,751 in 1872 to 17,614 in 1880; the number of seats from 2,397,745 in 1872, to 4,240,763 in 1880; and the average number of children in attendance from 1,445,326 in 1872, to 2,750,916 in 1880.

The population of England and Wales is 25,968,286.

5. SCOTLAND.

Population, 3,734,870. The parliamentary grant to elementary schools amounts to £488,512 for 1882-83. The number of elementary schools has increased from 1,962 in 1872 to 5,056 in 1889; the number of seats from 257,412 in 1872 to 602,054 in 1880, and the number of children in average attendance from 206,090 in 1872 to

6. IRELAND.

Population, 5,159,839. Number of elementary schools, 7,522. Number of pupils, 1,031,995. The parliamentary grants for popular education in Ireland amounted to a total of £2,948,669 in the ten years, 1860-69; in 1868 it was £360,195; in 1872, £450,300; and in 1882-83 it amounts to £729,868.

7. PRUSSIA.

Population, 27,251,057. The government expenditure for education amounts to $11,458,556 in 1882, against $10,000,000 in 1881. As nearly all the Prussian schools derive income from endowments, the government grants are chiefly devoted to the establishment of new schools and the improvement of old ones.

8. RUSSIA.

8. Russia, with a population of 78,500,000, and a school population of 15,000,000, has only 28,357 elementary schools and 1,213,325 pupils. The annual government grant to all grades of schools amounts to $9,000,000. Of this amount only $475,000 is devoted to elementary education. The finances of Russia exhibit large annual deficits, caused partly by an enormous expenditure for war, and partly by the construction of railways. According to official returns, the total war outlay incurred by Russia during the four years 1876–79 amounted to $728,984,635.

The mass of the population of Russia is as yet without education. In 1860 only two out of every hundred recruits levied for the army were able to read and write, but the proportion had largely increased in 1870, when eleven out of every one hundred were found to be possessed of these elements of knowledge.

10. AUSTRIA.

Education until recently was in a backward state in Austria, the bulk of the agricultural population, constituting two-thirds of the empire, being almost entirely illiterate. During the last twelve years, however, the Government has made vigorous efforts to bring about an improvement by founding new schools at the expense of the state wherever the conveniences were too poor. A law was passed in 1868 making education obligatory for all children between the ages of 6 and 14 was passed of 6 and 14.

The government expenditure for public education has increased from $2,300,000 in 1870 to $6,500,000 in 1881.

In this connection, as illustrating the educational impulse moving the whole

British Empire, we annex the following data of schools in the Province of On-

"The population of Ontario is 1,913,460, and the school population 489,924. In 1844 there were in the province 2,505 schools, with 96,755 pupils; in 1875, 5,058 schools, with 494,055 pupils; and in 1880, 5,245 schools, with 496,855 pupils. The total expenses for education were $275,000 in 1844, $2,297,694 in 1881, $3,258,125 in 1873, $3,433,210 in 1875, and $3,414,257 in 1880."

It will be observed that in every instance cited the nation assumes the duty and exercises the power not only of assisting but of controlling the subdivisions which make up the whole and provides for compulsory attendance of the child. The principle is fully recognized that when the general welfare demands, individuals and subdivisions must submit, if necessary for any cause, to receive compulsory blessings, coupled with which is the duty which implies the right of the whole to provide for the protection and safety of all the parts by the utmost exercise of its powers. True, their governments are not so complex as ours, but the principle is still the same. Self-preservation dictates this policy everywhere.

These statistics show that foreign governments aid the poorer classes to educate their children by very liberal grants, and they do so upon the ground that it makes a better, more moral, and more useful people. It makes life and property safer, and the Government stronger. It makes labor better and more useful in every condition of life. You can trust intelligence and skill, but you must watch ignorance all the can trust intelligence and skill, but you must watch ignorance all the time. The action of the old governments of the East is conclusive on the question of policy. They are not founded upon or dependent upon the will or intelligence of their people, while our Government is.

If important to them to encourage general education of the masses of the people how much more important it is to our own country, resting as it does upon the masses of the people; and more important to this country still because it is new and developing and unfixed, in comparison with the old governments. This Government is met with unsolved problems of legislation growing out of new conditions continually arising, which require intelligent thought by the people and their patient forbearance until wisdom leads the way through; and more still, because in this country there is a clash of conflicting interests arisstill, because in this country there is a clash of conflicting interests arising from our multiplied resources, rapid development, and quick growth, which do not exist in any comparative degree in the old governments.

With them different interests are permanently fixed and move along in regular grooves, while in this country new and enlarged development is constantly going on, changing and overshadowing previous conditions, which often taxes the patient bearing of our intelligent peo-ple before a satisfactory adjustment is established. All must see, there-fore, that general intelligence is the only anchor of domestic safety and the certain guarantee of peace.

I desire to read a part of the statement made by the committee on the Blair educational bill, which shows the number of illiterates in each State and the proportion of money due each under this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I plead for the purpose of these measures because I desire to see white and black, the poor and the ignorant, educated. I plead for them because the purpose is to create independent thought on all questions among the people receiving the benefits. I plead for them because they mean general intelligence and enlightenment. And lastly, I plead for them because they will make suffrage more sacred and the ballot more pure, which will ever uphold and maintain a republicant form of government in every State of the Union and walks. publican form of government in every State of the Union and make stronger and better the bonds now holding the States together for the purposes of the best government of men.

SPEECH

HON. OTHO R. SINGLETON,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 3, 1885,

On the bill (S. 2530) to authorize an additional appointment on the retired-list of the Λ rmy.

Mr. SINGLETON said:

Mr. Speaker: I wish to put upon record to-day something more than a mere negative vote upon this bill. I rise to protest against the establishment of a privileged class of citizens who are to be foisted upon the Government, draw money from the Treasury not needed for an economical support, but in this case to be added to an income of $15,000 a year—a sum greater than the estates of nineteen-twentieths of the people of the United States.

people of the United States.

Although the Constitution of the United States discourages any legislation tending to build up one class of people at the expense of another, yet this bill, with some others heretofore passed, proposes to establish a privileged order of persons, pension them on the Government for life, mere fungi upon the industrial interests of the country, and I must say the outgrowth of a mawkish and morbid sentimentality. To must say the outgrowth of a mawkish and morbid sentimentality. To bestow upon General Grant the gratuity of $17,000 per annum proposed in this bill would be to confer upon him that which was never offered to the Father of his Country, and which, if offered, would have been declined with that characteristic manliness and patriotism which prompted him to refuse a third term as President of the United States. The passage of this bill will certainly be a wide departure from the practices of the Government in its early history, and well calculated to awaken distrust and dissatisfaction in the public mind.

Every candid and impartial mind in its efforts to comprehend the awaken distrust and dissatisfaction in the public mind.

Every candid and impartial mind, in its efforts to comprehend the utility or justice of this measure, will want to know whether there is any pecuniary necessity in the case of General Grant which requires the passage of the bill; and if not, whether it will add anything to his reputation, or enhance in any way the public estimate of his civil or military services. I had supposed that having so large an annual income his best friends would not ask the passage of this bill upon the plea of pecuniary necessity. During his eight years' service as President he drew from the Treasury of the United States about $300,000, a large portion of it under a law which he, as a co-ordinate branch of the Government, aided in passing.

A donation of $250,000 was made him at one time by his friends and admirers, which is held in trust for his benefit, and, as stated before, yields him an annual income of $15,000. Besides this, houses and lots, horses and carriages, with innumerable other valuable presents, have horses and carriages, with innumerable other valuable presents, have been lavished upon him. Now, it is said that financial disaster has overtaken him. Suppose this to be true, whose fault is it? Has it come to this, that the Government is to become sponsor for or guarantor against all the financial blunders of General Grant? If so, when and where will the matter end? What distinguished gentleman will and where will the matter end? What distinguished gentleman will next apply?

The only bill bearing any analogy to this that ever received my support was the one which provided for retiring General Shields with the pay of brigadier-general. This was an exceptional case, growing out of his advanced age, his infirmity from wounds received in battle, and his absolute poverty. This was a case that pleaded trumpet-tongued for relief, and, I am proud to say, the House of the Forty-sixth Congress heeded the appeal and responded nobly to the call. A bill was passed with only 6 dissenting votes to retire him on a brigadier's pay, that the few days remaining of a well-spent life might be relieved from poverty and want. A nation's gratitude was due to this battle-scarred and maimed hero of two wars, and ex-Senator from three different States, whose pecuniary necessities were such that he was forced to pawn the swords bestowed upon him for gallant services in the field and deliver lectures to prolong existence.

and deliver lectures to prolong existence.

This bill went to the Senate—may I be allowed to say a Republican Senate—and was there amended by adding to it the name of General Grant. Then was heard the potent voice of the Senator from Vermont, the author of this bill, inveighing in terms of animated rhetoric against its passage, either in its original or amended form. I read from the RECORD his own language.

from the RECORD his own language.

Now, what is this species of legislation that we are called upon to pass? It is unequal; it is unjust; and it is contrary to any principle that the United States has ever before undertaken to advance or to enact into laws. General Shields has a pension, according to existing laws, that he has enjoyed for many years. This body has passed a bill increasing that pension, and I must presume that if he deserves it the other House will concur in the passage of that bill; and yet you propose to take this gentleman and another who has been added, and who ought to have been added if this sort of legislation is to proceed, as many others might be—you propose to take him and foist him into a branch of the public service with which he has no connection and which is founded upon a principle that does not apply to him at all.

If the Congress of the United States wish to give to General Shields the sum of $50,000, let them say so; but why do you take from the ranks of civil life one or two volunteer soldiers and place them in the regular Army of the United States by an act of legislation and an executive act, to the exclusion of those who have spent their whole lives in the military service of the country, and who beyond the number of three hundred are always from the retired-list? And in respect of these two individual cases the present law must necessarily exclude some two worthy persons who are now entitled to the places, under the regular law, that these persons would fill. If Senators believe that the people of these two distinguished soldiers ask anything of this sort, if Senators believe that either of these two distinguished soldiers ask anything of this sort, then I think they are greatly mistaken.

His speech had the effect to defeat the bill and the life of the second of the united states ask anything of this sort, then I think they are greatly mistaken.

His speech had the effect to defeat the bill, and the gallant Shields, wounded in the house of his supposed friends, mortified and chagrined at the ingratitude of his countrymen, soon passed away. Peace be to at the ingratitude of his countrymen, soon passed away. Peace be to the ashes of the gallant dead!

But the friends of General Grant, nothing daunted by defeat, now that Shields is out of the way, have rallied again in the Senate and sent us the present bill. What change has come over the spirit of the Senate's dream? Where was the able and eloquent Senator from Vermont when this great wrong, as he had denominated it, was being perpetrated? Was it the poverty of General Grant that prompted the hot haste of the Senate in passing this bill with only a few moments' debate? Was not General Shields poor and infirm from wounds received in his country's service? Was it defeated in the Senate before upon principle? If so, what new revelation has dawned upon the minds of the former opponents of this bill? It is said that men change, but principles never. The passage of this Senate bill fully establishes the truth of this saying.

But it is said this gratuity, bounty, or pension, as it may be denominated by its friends, is to be bestowed for "public services." Does this refer to his military or civil services? If to the former, I will not attempt to underrate them. But concede all that is claimed for General Grant in a military point of view, and I insist that he has been fully rewarded for all his services. He has been honored by the American people as no other man save Washington was ever honored, and I am not sure that I ought to make this exception. Twice elected President of the United States, drawing for one-half the time double the salary paid to Washington: secured in ample fortune by his friends, which never hap-United States, drawing for one-half the time double the salary paid to Washington; secured in ample fortune by his friends, which never happened to the Father of his Country; honored with a vote of thanks by Congress; his follies overlooked, his faults condoned, his friends rewarded, himself féted and caressed ad nauseam, and his trip around the world attended with all the "pride, pomp, and circumstance" of a triumphal march, what of earthly good remains to be secured to a reasonable man? What but prurient ambition or greed of gain can make him appear at the bar of this House, in the person of friends, and plead for further honors or more ample fortune? Is the pecuniary debt of the country to General Grant never to be liquidated, the account never to be closed? Will he leave nothing to be enjoyed by others equally meritorious? I would not strip from his brow one laurel that has been placed there by public acclaim; but all that is excellent of earth is not embodied in any one man. embodied in any one man.

Surely he has been amply rewarded for all his military services. But overzealous friends point to his civil services, and claim for them such pre-eminence as to merit all the honors and rewards which a nation can bestow. This is doubtful ground and admits of disputation. When he entered upon the duties of President the country had but recently emerged from a civil war in which alienation of feelings between different sections had been engendered and a heavy public debt incurred. As a wise statesman it should have been his policy, as it was his duty, to reconcile as far as possible brethren estranged and set on foot measures of economy that the public debt might be extinguished at as early a day as possible. To this end every subordinate officer in the Government should have been held to the plumb-line of honesty and fidelity. Did General Grant adopt this course? Let the history of his administration answer the question. Did he lift the Constitution from the dust into which the events of the war had cast it, and with the return Surely he has been amply rewarded for all his military services. But dust into which the events of the war had cast it, and with the return dust into which the events of the war had cast it, and with the return of peace banish the maxim, inter arma leges silent? Did he give place to peaceful methods of legislation and judicial supremacy? What measures did he adopt to promote conciliation and harmonize estranged sections of our country? By whose orders were legislative assemblies in the States dispersed at the point of the bayonet? By whose order was a major-general of the United States Army sent to Louisiana with violent purposes in his heart, who, without stint, abused and maligned her people in a communication to the War Department, and manifested great anxiety to try, condemn, and execute her citizens by drum-head court-martial? Who was it that removed the brave but generous Hancock from the position of military governor of the Southern military division of the United States because he declined to interfere with the division of the United States because he declined to interfere with the civil authorities of the State of Texas by exercising military power? Who was it that instigated Congress to attempt the passage of the "force bill," under the provisions of which he, the President, would have secured the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus in the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama? Who was it that stationed troops at the polls on election days to intimidate voters and secure the election of his political friends? And in 1876, when the people of the United States had chosen Mr. Tilden President by a popular majority of 260,000 and by a majority of nineteen in the electoral college, who was it that massed troops in Washington, and placed them constructively at the doors of this Hall to overawe Congress and force a compromise, by which the people's rights were sacrificed, their ballots disregarded and a man installed into office who was never elected? Call you this quieting dissensions and promoting peace? If so, it was the you this quieting dissensions and promoting peace? If so, it was the regarded and a man installed into office who was never elected? Call you this quieting dissensions and promoting peace? If so, it was the peace which reigned in Warsaw.

But again: Did he manage our finances with that skill and economy which ought to challenge our admiration and secure our confidence? Under whose administration was silver demonetized and thereby one-fourth of our currency destroyed? Upon whose recommendation was the law passed declaring all our bonded indebtedness payable in coin, when by the terms of the contract it was payable in currency, thereby increasing the burdens of the people hundreds of millions of dollars? Whose Cabinet but his was ever defiled by the presence of a jobber in post-traderships, and, when impeached before the Senate with evidence sufficient to convict, was allowed to escape merited punishment by the tender of his resignation and its acceptance by General Grant? Whose friends but his ever organized themselves into a whisky ring to deffaud the Government of its revenues, and, when overtaken and convicted after a fair trial, received pardon at the hands of the nation's Chief Executive? What administration but his, in a time of profound peace, before the war or since, up to its date, has cost the people $180,000,000 in one year?

Where now are the evidences of his financial ability, the triumphs of his statesmanship? What did he while in office but punish his supposed enemies and reward his friends, even to the extent of the most shameless and disgusting nepotism.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken plainly because I feel strongly, but I have said nothing that the facts of history will not fully prove and nothing shametess and disgusting nepotism.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken plainly because I feel strongly, but I have said nothing that the facts of history will not fully prove, and nothing but what it is my duty to say as a Representative upon this floor.

But lest I may be charged with prejudice and injustice, I will call to the stand a witness whose testimony General Grant's friends will not impeach, and whose whole experience as a public man, at the time of speaking, was had under Grant's administration—one who speaks in no uncertain terms nor minces language in his description of things. I read from the speech of Senator HOAR, of Massachusetts, delivered in the Senate on the occasion of the impeachment of Secretary Belknap. Mr. HOAR said:

My own public life has been a very brief and insignificant one, extending little beyond the duration of a single term of a Senatorial office. But in that brief perical I have seen five judges of a high court of the United States driven from office by threats of impeachment for corruption or maladministration. I have heard the taunt from friendliest lips that when the United States presented herself in the East to take part with the civilized world in generous competition in the arts of life, the only product of her institutions in which she surpassed all others beyond question was her corruption. I have seen in the State in the Union foremost in power and wealth four judges of her courts impeached for corruption, and the political administration of her chief city become a disgrace and a by-word throughout the world. I have seen the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in the House, now a distinguished member of this court, rise in his place and demand the expulsion of four of his associates for making sale of their official privilege of selecting the youths to be educated at our military school. When the greatest railroad of the world, binding together the continent and uniting the two great seas which wash our shores, was finished, I have seen our national triumph and exultation turned to bitterness and shame by the unanimous reports of the three committees of Congress, two of the House and one here, that every step of that mighty enterprise had been taken in fraud. I have heard in highest places the shameless doctrine avowed by men grown old in public office that the true way by which power should be gained in the Republic is to bribe the people with the offices created for their service, and the true end for which it should be used when gained is the promotion of selfish ambition and the gratification of personal revenge. I have heard that suspicion haunts the footsteps of the trusted companions of the President.

These things have passed into history. The Hallam or the Tacitus or the Sismondi or th

Mr. Speaker, so impressed were the people with the truthfulness of this word picture, drawn by a master hand, that at the next Presidential election General Grant's majority of 760,000 was overcome, and a majority of 260,000 given for Mr. Tilden, a difference of over one mill-

Here, then, was a popular verdict as to the merits of General Grant's civil services, which, together with his rejection by his own party at Chicago as a candidate for the third term, ought forever to settle the question of his statesmanship and show to this House the folly of voting him a gratuity of $17,000 a year during the rest of his life.

The people have not asked it to be done, neither in primary meetings nor through their State Legislatures, although the matter has been under discussion for years. Dare we then say to the people, you must stint yourselves, eat coarse food, and wear threadbare clothing that General Grant, for the balance of his life, who has already been munificently rewarded for his services, "may fare sumptuously every day, and be clothed in purple and fine linen?"

If hero-worship in this favored land of ours has taken such deep root in the hearts of our people, and has attained to such stalwart growth as to secure their assent, much less the approval of this measure, then may we lament the degeneracy of the times, and exclaim in the impassioned language of another, O tempora! O mores!

General Grant.

SPEECH

HON. ROBERT T. DAVIS.

OF MASSACHUSETTS.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, March 3, 1885,

On the bill (S. 2530) to authorize an additional appointment on the retired-list of the Army.

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, said:
Mr. SPEAKER: I trust that this bill will pass the House with entire unanimity. It should pass, not only as the evidence of grateful appreciation of the priceless services of its illustrious beneficiary, but as an act of justice to the nation. It will prove to the present and coming generations that the Government of a free people is ready and willing generations that the Government of a free people is ready and willing to reward extraordinary instances of the most eminent public qualities when successfully exerted in critical periods of its history. And who is there who loves his country that is not proud of the military fame of our great commander—so inseparably and gloriously associated with the triumph of Union and Liberty—a triumph beneficent to every section and to all classes, and yet to be hailed South as well as North as the best possible result of that inevitable and giant conflict of forces in which the combatants on either side were irresistibly impelled by inherited and historic influences to assume their respective registions herited and historic influences to assume their respective positions.

It is the glory of Grant that he successfully wielded the superior military resources of the Government against soldiers as brave and generals as skillful as our own—for they were each Americans, each inheritors of the best blood of historic races and of common traditions inheritors of the best blood of historic races and of common traditions of civil and military greatness. And is it not to-day a cause of universal pride and joy that after the great conflict ended with its strange vicissitudes, its defeats and triumphs, the tears and sighs, the sorrow and despair of that great agony, the final victory was a victory of our country, our whole country, North and South, East and West, the vindication of its Constitution, and of the principles of the great Declaration, and the consecration of the national idea in the heart of every American. The clemency and generosity of our great leader in the hour of victory attests the grandeur of his character, and won for him the enduring esteem and admiration of the conquered, who were subdued not more by the fortune of war than by the generous kindness of dued not more by the fortune of war than by the generous kindness of Unquestionably, more than any man who has yet lived, or it is to be Onquestionably, more than any man who has yet fived, or it is to be hoped will live for a thousand years, Grant has given his country a military history. Vicksburg has no parallel in modern and but one in ancient history, when the greatest genius of antiquity led the victorious legions of Rome, whose conquering tread had resounded through subjugated nations and continents, against a fortified position held by an uncivilized though gallant foe; but nowhere was his greatness of soul so manifest as in the bloody and dreadful march through the Wilderness upon Petersburg and Richmond.

He knew well in advance the fearful cost of that campaign; knew that countless thousands of the noblest, best, and bravest of our sons must lie down in death that our country might live. He heard in anticipation the wail of horror that rose from every hamlet and hearth as those devoted men fell before the murderous fire of a gallant and determined enemy, who had staked all upon that issue, and were fight-ing under their chosen and superb leader with the courage of despair. He heard the censures, deep and bitter, which his apparently reckless waste of human life incurred.

The greatest poet of the last generation made inanimate nature sympathize with the inevitable fate of the soldiers who were marching to the most famous of European battles:

And Ardennes waves above them her green leaves, Dewy with nature's tear-drops, as they pass, Grieving, if aught inanimate e'er grieves, Over the unreturning brave—alas!
Ere evening to be trodden like the grass
Which now beneath them, but above shall grow
In its next verdure, when this fiery mass
'Of living valor, rolling on the foe,
And burning with high hope, shall molder cold and low.

How much more strongly do his mournful lines apply to this cam-

paign of death.

Who doubts that through the dark cloud of battle he saw the majestic and benignant genius of his country beckoning him on to conflict and to victory, that above its din and tumult he heard its commanding voice saying, "Fail not, falter not; you are the chosen leader in this supreme moment; upon the issue of this campaign rests the destinies of unborn and untold millions of the race." That calm, determined, and have a pullistened and characteristic and the improved field of A proported. heroic soul listened and obeyed; and the immortal field of Appomattox will testify forever to his glory and success.

It is for us, in behalf of our own and future times, to prove to this great citizen, now in his old age and visited by sickness, misfortune, and sorrow that a grateful country remembers and values his inestimable services.

The resolution offered and referred on said 5th day of December, 1884, reads as follows:

The resolution offered and referred on said 5th day of December, 1884, reads as follows:

Resolved, That inasmuch as this House has the right and the desire, never yet fully granted or gratified, to obtain full information concerning the imprisonment of all American citizens recently arrested and imprisoned by the British Government as "suspects," the President is hereby requested to communicate in full to this House all correspondence by mail, telegram, and cable, whether in cipher or otherwise, between the State Department and our minister at London, and between the Department, our minister, and our consuls to and from each other, and to and from the persons so arrested and imprisoned, claiming to be American citizens, concerning the arrest and imprisonment more particularly of the following American citizens, to wit, Michael P. Boyton, William Brophy, Joseph Dalton, James F. Daly, M. B. Fogerty, John L. Gannon, Henry George, Michael Hart, M. Hickey, James Lynam, John R. McCormick, John McEnery, Daniel McSweeny, D. COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

I have no desire to say an unkind word of any member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of either this or the last Congress, yet I may be permitted to say that during the entire continuance of both Congresses, during which insults and indignities have been offered to our citizenship such as have never before been offered or endured by any nation, we have had no report from that committee, to which such matters are referred and intrusted, upon these outrages, and we have experienced great delays in having mere resolutions of inquiry referred to that committee reported within the time prescribed by our rules. Several such resolutions of vital importance to the honor of our nation have been delayed for months, and many worthy of immediate and thorough investigation, including that now under consideration, have never been and never will be taken up or considered at all.

I am sure that a brief sketch of the history of this question of American citizenship must prove interesting to all American citizens, and that I propose now to give.

EXPATRIATION AND NATURALIZATION.

Although England at the close of our Revolutionary war had formally acknowledged our independence, she submitted to her destiny with great reluctance. Her military and naval officers missed no opportunity to show their contempt for ours, and many personal difficul-ties and duels resulted therefrom, in which the gallant Decatur was prominent, and English insolence was frequently chastised.

As early as 1797 fears were entertained that in case of war with England our naturalized citizens found fighting in our Army or Navy would be executed as traitors to their native country on account of England's claim to perpetual allegiance, by which they ignored our naturalization laws

Accordingly, on the 17th day of June, 1797, a measure was introduced in Congress declaring the right of expatriation; on the 22d of that month it was fully discussed in the House of Representatives by Samuel Sewall and Harrison Gray Otis of Massachusetts, Albert Gallatin of Pennsylvania, William B. Giles and Thomas Claiborne of Virginia, Robert G. Harper, then of South Carolina, and others. It was finally postponed till the first Monday of November in that year, and was never taken up again.

THE SECOND WAR.

The outrages committed on our flag by England impressing our seamen on the ground that she could take her subjects anywhere and compel them to serve her cause on the ground of perpetual allegiance led to the second war, and during its continuance, on the 21st of January, 1814, Thomas B. Robertson, of Louisiana, offered a resolution in the House of Representatives providing for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the exercise of the right of expatriation, but after a lengthy discussion by Thomas J. Oakley of New York, John C. Calhoun of South Carolina, Nathaniel Macon of North Carolina, and others, it was laid on the table.

RETALIATION AND REPRISAL.

At the battle of Queenstown Heights, in the second war with England, General Winfield Scott was forced to surrender, with about three hundred men, to the superior forces of General Sheaffe. In the subsequent exchange of prisoners the British officers at Quebec selected those who, exchange of prisoners the British officers at Quebec selected those who, by confession or accent, were adjudged to be Irishmen, to be sent to England to be tried and hanged for high treason. Twenty-three were selected, some adopted citizens of the United States, and several had American families at home, whom they had left to fight for their adopted country. General Scott came on deck while this selection was going on and told the men to answer no more questions, and that the United States would not fail to avenge their gallant soldiers by retaliation or a refusal to give quarter in battle. The naturalized citizens were put in irons and sent to England. On the 13th of January, 1813, General Scott reported the facts to the Secretary of War, and the same day his letter was sent to Congress. On the 3d of March, 1813, a bill was passed in Congress vesting the President of the United States with the power of retaliation. the power of retaliation.

In the battle and capture of Fort George, May 27, 1813, General Scott made a great number of English prisoners, and from these he immediately selected twenty-three to abide the fate of the twenty-three Irish-Americans sent to England. This led to the taking of other hostages, men and officers whose lives depended on the fate of these twenty-three Irish-Americans. The number imprisoned by the British as hostages was very large. There were 1,200 American prisoners confined at one time at Chatham, and thousands of Americans, native and naturalized, impressed. After peace had been declared, these twenty-three Irish-Americans, after a confinement of over two years in British prisons, were returned to the United States, all but two who had in the mean time died natural deaths. The survivors received their land bounties and their long arrears of pay. General Scott's mode of pro-tecting American citizens was different from the Lowell method.

Early in the second war the United States brig of war Nautilus was captured. Six of her crew were selected as British subjects to be sent to England and tried for their lives. Commodore Rodgers selected double the number of English prisoners, including a midshipman, whom he held as hostages for the captured Americans. They were all afterward released.

For many years Algerine slavery was the terror of the civilized world.

The appearance of a corsair of the Barbary powers created more alarm than the approach of a plague or the occurrence of an earthquake. Many of our citizens became the victims of this cruelty, and were thrown into dungeons and subjected to nameless sufferings. The gallant Decatur in 1805, and again in 1815, opened these prisons with the guns of our Navy. The Dey of Algiers held some of our citizens prisoners in 1815. Decatur sailed from New York on the 20th of May, in that year, with an American squadron. On the 15th of June he arrived at Gibraltar. On the 17th he attacked an Algerine frigate and captured her after two broadsides and the death of her admiral, and on the 28th appeared before Algiers and demanded the release of our prisoners. He gave three hours for the return of our citizens, and promptly on time they were restored to the Stars and Stripes.

There was no delay in examining passports or in picking flaws in the proof of citizenship. That was not the plan of Decatur. The thunder of his cannon shook the shores of the Mediterranean, and the blaze of his guns lighted the gloom of the darkest dungeons of Algerine of his guns lighted the gloom of the darkest dungeons of Algerine slavery. Just before the expiration of the three hours' time appointed by Decatur a boat shot out from the shore. With his ringing trumpet he hailed the boat: "Are the prisoners here?" The response was, "They are, sir; every one." That was the American way of protecting American citizenship—so different from the Lowell method. In forty days after his departure from New York he had vindicated our flag and rescued our prisoners, and in seventy days had compelled three hostile powers to sue for peace on terms dictated from his own quarter-deck. His flag-ship was the Guerriere, captured by Hull from England, and another of his squadron was the Macedonian, taken by himself from the same power. No wonder that the Algerine said to the British consul, "You promised if America assailed us that your navy would be on hand; I see that two of your frigates are here."

EFFORTS TO CHANGE THE LAW.

On the 12th of February, 1814, William Findlay, of Pennsylvania, in discussing the supply bill to carry on the war, made a very important speech on the question of expatriation, but nothing was done to establish the right or provide for its exercise.

After the war, on the 15th of December, 1817, Mr. Robertson, of Louisiana, again introduced his measure in the House, and the resolution to appoint a committee to prepare a bill was adopted. One week afterward, on the 22d of December, Mr. Robertson reported from the committee a bill providing for the exercise of the right of expatriation, but after discussion by James Johnson, of Virginia, Lewis McLane, of Delaware, and others, it was defeated by striking out the first section by a vote of 70 to 58.

W. E. ROBINSON'S PETITION.

For a quarter of a century nothing more was done on this subject. In the Journal of the Senate of the United States for the 27th of February, 1842, page 176, the following entry appears:

Mr. Clay presented the memorial of William E. Robinson, praying that the rights secured to native citizens may be extended to naturalized immigrants from foreign countries; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

In that petition I said that-

In that petition I said that—

No act of Congress, no decision of our courts has shaken the power of the feudal principle of perpetual allegiance, a principle at war with the spirit of our Revolution, which makes man the vassal of the lord and chains him to the soil on which he was born as the property of his superior. That England would still assert her power over our naturalized citizens in case of a war may be seen from the proclamation issued by George the Third in 1807, by which he recalled from foreign service all seamen and seafaring men who were natural-born subjects of Great Britain, and ordered them to withdraw themselves from such service and return home on pain of being proceeded against for a contempt, and that no naturalization papers would be respected.

I followed this up by sending several similar petitions to Henry Clay, of Kentucky, and in the Congressional Globe, second session Twenty seventh Congress, reporting the proceedings in that body of March 29, 1842, at page 365, Mr. Clay declared that the United States would protect the naturalized citizen with the cannon of the country.

Senator Lewis F. Linn, of Missouri, who had served in the last war, called Mr. Clay's attention to the fact that during the war thirty-three soldiers of the American Army were made prisoners by British troops and sentenced to be executed because they were of British origin; but as peace was soon after declared the execution did not take place.

Mr. Clay said he recollected the incident referred to, and had the American soldiers been executed we should have retaliated by executing some British officers. He thought England would never act toward any of our citizens on the doctrine of perpetual allegiance—an exploded doctrine—a doctrine which could not be maintained in practice. He asked that the subject be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WEBSTER AND CASS

It is proper to notice here that in 1842 Mr. Webster, then Secretary of State, made very earnest efforts with and appeals to the British Government to surrender the claim of perpetual allegiance, but they were rejected or declined.

Lewis Cass also, in his able examination of the right of search, did much to establish the true American doctrine on this subject.

THE '48 TROUBLES.

The question then took another sleep for six years, till 1848, when the popular uprising in Ireland took place under Smith O'Brien. An Irish directory had been formed in New York, including Horace Gree-ley, Robert Emmet, Charles O'Conor, and John McKeon, all natives of this country except Robert Emmet. This directory openly advo-cated men, money, and arms to aid Ireland in her struggle for inde-pendence. No American was allowed to travel through Ireland unpendence. molested, and numerous arrests of American citizens were made on the most frivolous grounds. Indeed, an order was issued by the British Government to arrest all Americans found traveling in Ireland, and ambng those arrested were James Bergen, of Boston, and Frank Ryan, of Cincinnati. I brought these cases to the attention of our Govern-

James K. Polk was President, James Buchanan was Secretary of State, James K. Polk was President, James Buchanan was Secretary of State, and George Bancroft was our minister to England. A long and angry correspondence between the governments ensued, but England delayed the release of our citizens till it suited her convenience. That correspondence was published on the call of Congress, and a newspaper called The People, published in New York, by Devin Reilly, John McClenahan, and myself, in its first number of January 13, 1849, reviewed that correspondence in a slashing article of six or eight columns, the ablest exposition of the question at issue ever published in the United States. When it suited the convenience of England, and not before, our citizens were released, and Bergen and Ryan were welcomed to New York with a grand reception by Horace Greeley and others.

WEBSTER AND HULSEMANN.

The political earthquake of 1848 shook almost every throne in Europe, and kings and emperors were trembling at the progress of American ideas. As they regained confidence they renewed their efforts to curb that progress

Our next difficulty about citizenship occurred with a continental power. During the Hungarian struggle for independence, in the memorable summer of 1849, the administration of President Taylor sent out Mr. A. Dudley Mann as American agent to visit Hungary and report on the real state of things in that country, with a view of being among the first to acknowledge her existence as an independent nation in case her brave defenders should succeed in placing her in that position. This fact having been communicated to Congress by President Taylor in a special message roused the wrath of Austria.

Chevalier J. G. Hulsemann was then the Austrian minister at Wash-*Chevalier J. G. Huisemann was then the Austrian minister at Washington, and he addressed a lengthy and saucy letter to our Secretary of State, Daniel Webster, under date of September 30, 1850, in which he complains that Mr. Mann's instructions designated the Austrian Government as an "iron rule," and represented Kossuth, the rebel chief, as "an illustrious man," and said he made "ample allowance for the ignorance of the Cabinet at Washington" and the mendacious rumors of the American press.

This Austrian letter roused the feelings of the somewhat saturnine Secretary of State, but he restrained his wrath for nearly three months, and then, on the 21st of December, 1850, poured it out in a long letter rarely matched in diplomacy. He drew a vivid sketch of the progress, power, and extent of this country in comparison to which Austria was but as "a patch on the earth's surface," and he declared that it was not only our right but our duty to sympathize with the peoples of all countries trying to adopt institutions similar to our own.

THE KOSZTA CASE,

The next time in which this question came up was in 1853, in the celebrated correspondence between Chevalier Hulsemann and our Secretary of State, William L. Marcy, in which higher ground for protection of our citizens was taken by Mr. Marcy than had ever been taken before or since.

Martin Koszta, by birth a Hungarian and an Austrian subject, took an open and active part in the political movement under Kossuth in -'49, designed to detach Hungary from the dominion of the Emperor of Austria. At the close of that disastrous movement Koszta, with many of his compatriots, fled from the Austrian dominions and took many of his compatriots, hed from the Austrian dominions and took refuge in Turkey. Austria demanded their extradition, which Turkey firmly resisted. After long confinement at Kutaieh, they were in 1851 released on condition that they should go into foreign parts with the concurrence of Austria. Koszta came to this country, and on the 31st of July, 1852, before a proper tribunal in the city of New York, made a declaration under oath of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, renouncing all allegiance to any other state or sovereign, and particularly to the Emperor of Austria.

After remaining in this country one year and eleven months he returned to Turkey in an American vessel to attend to some private business. He landed at Smyrna and put himself under the protection of the American consul and claimed the right of a naturalized American citizen. After consultation the American chargé d'affaires ad interim at Constantinople and the American consul at Smyrna furnished Kosztawith a tezkereh, a species of passport or letter of safe conduct, which foreign consuls have a right to give under Turkish law to those to whom they wish to extend protection. While waiting for an opportunity to return to the United States he was seized by a band of lawless men, cruelly treated, and thrown into the sea. Immediately afterward he was taken up by a boat's crew lying in wait for him, belonging to the Austrian brig of war, the Huszar, forced on board, and there confined in irons.

This was on the 21st of June, 1853. Capt. Duncan N. Ingraham, now living in South Carolina, happened oppportunely to have come into the port of Smyrna with the United States sloop of war Saint Louis, and having learned that the design was to carry Koszta to Trieste, in Austrian territory, on consultation with our chargé d'affaires and consultation with our chargé d'affair sul, on the 2d day of July, 1853, he sent a message to the commander of the Huszar in which he demanded the surrender of Koszta into his hands, and if this was not complied with by 4 o'clock on the afternoon of that day he would take him by main force. Following this demand he drew his sloop of war up to within a half-cable's length of the Austrian vessel, loaded his guns, and got ready for action, when the Austrian yielded and agreed that Koszta should be delivered in charge of the consul-general of France until the difficulty was settled.

The Austrian Government addressed a circular letter of complaint to the principal European cabinets against the action of Captain Ingraham. The cabinets of St. Petersburg and Berlin instructed their representatives at Washington to intimate their general concurrence in the view taken by Austria, but on the 21st of September, 1853, by general consent of the parties concerned, Koszta was released and sailed from Smyrna for the United States on board the American bark Mimosa, and thus the matter of his personal liberty was settled. In the mean time Hulsemann had written an excited and lengthy letter to Secretary Marcy under date of August 29, 1853, in which he protests against Captain Ingraham's conduct as an act of war and calls upon the Government of the United States to surrender Koszta to Austria; to disavow the conduct of its agents in this Koszta affair; to "call them to a severe account," and to tender to Austria a satisfaction proportionate to the magnitude of the outrage.

o this Mr. Marcy replied in a long and vigorous letter, dated Septo this Mr. Marcy replied in a long and vigorous letter, dated september 26, 1853, in which the American doctrine of the right of expatriation and the duty of our country to defend all persons clothed, however slightly, in American nationality are set forth in language which contrasts strongly with our doubtful diplomacy in these later days. The conduct of our consul, Mr. Offley, of Mr. Brown, our chargé d'affaires ad interim, and particularly of our gallant Captain Ingraham, was approved, and the demand of Austria for apology firmly rejected.

This was the high character of American citizenship and the invincible sanctity of protection to all persons who, even though not fully naturalized, were clothed with American nationality, which Mr. Marcy left to his successors in the State Department.

THE FENIAN TROUBLES.

But in 1866 England saw fit to insult our flag in her indiscriminate But in 1866 England saw fit to insult our flag in her indiscriminate arrest of numerous American citizens. Some were native Americans, such as General William J. Nagle, Capt. John McCafferty, Capt. John McClure, and John H. Rogers (now a respected officer of this House). Most of them had served gallantly and with great distinction in the Union Army. General Nagle had prominently distinguished himself at the terrible battle of Fredericksburg. Col. John H. Gleason, Col. John W. Byron, General Thomas F. Bourke, Col. John Warren, Capt. Patrick J. Condon, Capt. John McClure, and many others who had won distinction and brevets on our battlefields, were cast into prison, some charged with crime and overt acts, but many of them on mere suscharged with crime and overt acts, but many of them on mere suspicion. Others were tried and convicted and punished for words spoken and acts done in the United States. To those who established their nativity in the United States—Nagle, McCafferty, and George Francis Train—a mixed jury of half aliens was accorded; but to those who were naturalized citizens of the United States equal privileges were denied.

Their certificates of the United States equal privileges were denied. Their certificates of naturalization were treated, as described by the correspondent of the New York Tribune, as of "no more account than an old programme of the performance of Christy's Minstrels."

Notwithstanding the declaration of Mr. Clay that England would never dare to act upon the exploded doctrine of perpetual allegiance, England did act upon that doctrine, and made a marked and offensive difference between the native and naturalized citizens of the United States, and her judges announced that exploded doctrine in the most offensive way. Stephen J. Meany, John Warren, Eugene Costello, and others were held and punished for words and acts spoken and done in the United States.

While trial by a mixed jury was accorded to native American citizens, it was denied to all naturalized citizens on the specific doctrine of perpetual allegiance and in contempt of our laws of naturalization.

It is worthy of notice here that Secretary Seward submitted the ques tion to Attorney-General Stanbery, whether our citizens had the right to claim a jury of half foreigners as provided in British law, and he gave his opinion that they could not claim it, while the British judges and lawyers decided that they could. They only denied it to naturalized citizens, and thus made an offensive distinction.

THE FORTIETH CONGRESS.

In November, 1866, members to the Fortieth Congress of the United States were elected, and fortunately among those so elected was myself. Under ordinary circumstances this Congress would not have met until the first Monday in December, 1867, but the quarrel between Congress and President Johnson resulted in its meeting on the 4th of March, nine months before its regular time.

Immediately after its organization, on the 7th of March, 1867, I offered the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby requested to communicate to this House all correspondence, documents, and proceedings in possession of the Departments relating to the arrest, imprisonment, and treatment of American citizens in Great Britain or its provinces within two years last

This resolution was answered by President Johnson on the 21st of March, 1867, and the House was informed that the publication of the correspondence might be detrimental to the public good.

On the 27th of March, 1867, Mr. Banks, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, by instructions of the committee, reported a resolu-

on Foreign Affairs, by instructions of the committee, reported a resolution extending the sympathy of the House of Representatives "to the people of Ireland and of Canada in all their just efforts to maintain the independence of states, to elevate the people, and to extend and perpetuate the principle of liberty."

Mr. Banks yielded the floor to me as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I stated that while I supported the resolution I was a few forms of the committee of the commit in favor of a much more decided expression of sympathy. I was followed by Mr. Pile, Mr. Banks, Mr. Wasburne, of Wisconsin, Mr. Wood, and Mr. Eldredge, and the resolution was unanimously adopted.

Congress then adjourned over from March 30 till the 3d of July. On the 10th of July, 1867, I obtained unanimous consent to introduce a resolution asking the Committee on Foreign Affairs "to report immediately whether any American citizen had been arrested, tried, or convicted and sentenced in Great Britain or Ireland for words spoken or acts done in the United States," and had read by the Clerk reports of the trial of Stephen J. Meany, with the comments upon it in the New York Herald of March 11, 1867. My resolution was unanimously adopted.

July 20, 1867, Mr. Cullon, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a resolution asking the President of the United States for information on my resolution of the 10th. Mr. Banks presented a communication from the Secretary of State, reporting that the Department had heard of only one case, that of Captain McCafferty. I stated that the Department of State seemed to be ignorant of the fact known to al-most everybody else, that Stephen J. Meany, William J. Nagle, and General Halpine had been so arrested. The resolution was unanimously adonted

On this 20th day of July, 1867, Congress, by concurrent resolution, took a recess to the 21st day of November.

Four months then intervened, and in the mean time nothing had been done about our citizens in British jails, and immediately on the reas-sembling of Congress, on the 21st of November, I took the floor. I had been urging attention to the case of our citizens in several resolutions and speeches, but without much earnest support. A quarter of a cent-ury had passed since I had petitioned Congress through Henry Clay, of Kentucky, to declare the right of expatriation and that our natu-ralized citizens should stand on equal footing with our native citizens. Thrice the question had come before Congress, and, although advo-cated by such statesmen as Claiborne, Gallatin, Macon, Otis, and Calhoun, it had failed, and I resolved to make a determined and successful fight for it.

CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS.

In the mean time our minister to England, Charles Francis Adams, was accused of neglecting our citizens then in British jails, and two men, claiming to be American citizens and known since then as two of the Manchester martyrs, had been sentenced to death on the 23d of November. Their friends claimed and they proclaimed in court that had it not been for the neglect of Mr. Adams their lives might have Accordingly, on the first day of the reassembling of Congress, in or-Accordingly, on the first day of the reassembling of Congress, in order to call special attention to the subject and to obtain the floor on a privileged question, I moved to impeach our minister for neglect of duty, and to request the President to telegraph to Mr. Adams to demand his passports and return home. Also, that the Secretary of State be requested to impart to the House all information concerning our imprisoned citizens, "without reference to its public effect, to be considered if need he in secret session of the House." sidered if need be in secret session of the House."

After speaking a few minutes the House adjourned till Monday, the 25th of November, when I continued and concluded my speech, which was afterward printed in pamphlet form and widely circulated. I closed by declaring the principles on which the United States would act in protecting her citizens abroad: First, that no American citizen should be arrested in foreign countries without proper charges or sworn information, on which he was to have a fair and speedy trial, even under suspension of habeas corpus; second, that no American citizen without charge of crime should be ordered by any foreign government to quit its country; and, third, that the benefits of English law shall be fully accorded to adopted as well as native citizens—the same as to aliens of other countries. I also moved the following resolution, for action by the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved, That the committee be requested, at their earliest convenience, to report a bill or declaration providing for the expatriation of such of our citizens as may wish to be naturalized in other countries, and how far we shall protect the rights of natives of other countries naturalized in the United States.

In the mean time, on the 23d of November, 1867, while I held the cor, the Manchester martyrs were executed. God save Ireland! floor, the Manchester martyrs were executed. CONSUL WEST.

On the first Monday of December, 1867, the first session of Congress terminated, and immediately the second session was opened. Having received several letters from several of these American prisoners concerning the conduct of our consul at Dublin, W. B. West, I brought the matter before the House immediately on its assembling on the 2d of December, 1867, and moved that the Committee on Foreign Affairs inquire into Mr. West's conduct, and detailed the indignities heaped upon Capt. P. J. Condon, General Denis F. Burke, John H. Rogers, and others who had been imprisoned for months without any charge being brought against them, and were finally marched between police officers to the ships on which they were compelled to embark and leave the country. This was a clear infringement not only of national law but in violation of our treaties with England. Even in the Jay treaty it was stipulated that even in time of war citizens of the United States should be allowed a year to arrange their business in safety provided they violated no law.

THE COUNTRY ROUSED.

In the mean time vast meetings had been held in the principal cities of the Union. A meeting was held in Cincinnati, November 23, 1867, estimated at 50,000. The same evening a meeting of the soldiers of our late war, estimated at 7,000, was held in and at Cooper Union, and on the 26th another meeting at the same place, estimated at 10,000, and addressed by Horace Greeley, General Cochran, Judge Charles P. Daly, John McKeon, A. Oakey Hall, General Halpine, and others. At these meetings stirring resolutions were adopted sustaining my movements in Congress and returning thanks to me by name.

The day before I made the last speech above referred to, Mr. Norman B. Judd, a member from Illinois, who had been our minister to Prussia, called on me and informed me that he was going to make a statement supporting my views. Accordingly, as soon as I had concluded my remarks Mr. Judd took the floor and made a strong speech, which he opened as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I have listened with attention to the detail of grievances made by the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON], and I say here and at this time that any member of this House who will listen to that detail of wrongs and not feel his blood flow a little quicker through his veins, is not the American citizen that I supposed him to be."

The public meetings in our large cities, and the joint resolutions adopted by the Legislatures of several States in favor of this measure, roused the country to active measures, and our Congressmen were not slow in taking the hint that this subject could not longer be neglected. On the floor of the House a dozen members were on their feet at one time clamoring for recognition. Numerous bills were presented during the months of December and January, which, with all my resolutions, joint resolutions of Legislatures, and the communications from the President and Secretary of State, were all referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. That committee consisted of N. P. Banks (chairman), Godlove S. Orth, Shelby M. Cullom, C. C. Washburne, Denis McCarthy, Austin Blair, Leonard Myers, W. E. Robinson, and George W. Morgan.

On the 20th of December, 1867, fretting under the delay of the committee, I obtained unanimous consent to read a long petition from General W. J. Nagle, dated Kilmainham Jail, November 25, 1867, and also a statement signed by the mayor, city clerk, and other officials of Brooklyn, and the sheriff of Kings County, demanding the immediate release of our citizens, all of which I had printed in the official record; and

I offered the following resolution:

Resolved. That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, requested by this House to take immediate action on the cases of William J. Nagle and John Warren, now in British prisons, one held without trial since June 1, 1867, and the other convicted by a jury to which the challenge allowed by English law to citizens or subjects of other countries was refused; that a new trial be granted to one and a speedy trial to the other, or liberty to both.

Mr. Benjamin objecting, the resolution was not considered.

BILL ON EXPATRIATION.

On the 27th of January, 1868, Mr. Banks reported a bill which had been matured by the committee, which provided that if any naturalized citizens were wrongfully arrested, or held in any way liable to perpetual allegiance, the President should seize citizens or subjects of the power thus acting as reprisals or hostages.

On the 29th of January the bill came up for discussion, and half a dozen speeches were made upon it.

January 30 the discussion was continued, and six or seven more speeches were made.

FIELD DAY IN THE HOUSE,

February 3, 1868, was a grand field day in the House on American citizenship. Mr. Hopkins, of Wisconsin, presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature of that State declaring the duty of Government to protect our citizens abroad. After the morning hour had expired I rose and asked if it would be in order now to suspend the rules to introduce a resolution which I had in my hand. The Speaker [Mr. Colfax] ruled that a contested-election case was the first matter in order. After one speech had been delivered on the election case I asked unanimous consent to introduce my resolution. Several members called for the regular order, and my resolution was not received. I protested that American citizens are rotting in English jails and we can get in everything but their claims.

Mr. Eldredge, of Wisconsin, a few minutes later, got the floor and yielded to me. I introduced a long preamble reciting the facts in the trial of Stephen J. Meaney, John Warren, General Halpine, Augustus Costello, and W. J. Nagle, and a resolution requesting the President to examine these cases, and if he found the allegations in the preamble to be true to demand the immediate release of any and all our citizens charged with or convicted for words or acts spoken or done in the United States; to demand an immediate new trial for any American citizen who had been denied his challenge to the array of the jury on the ground of perpetual allegiance, and to demand the immediate release of William J. Nagle.

And in case of such demand being refused the President is hereby requested to order the arrest of and detain in custody any subjects or citizens of Great Britain who may be found within the jurisdiction of the United States, and to withdraw all intercourse of the United States with Great Britain.

Mr. Bingham, Mr. Maynard, and Mr. Banks objected, whereupon I moved to suspend the rules to enable me to offer the resolution. On a division there were—ayes 60, noes 30; and the motion to a rules, requiring two-thirds, was lost, whereupon I demanded the yeas rules, requiring two-thirds, was lost, whereupon I demanded the yeas rules, requiring two-thirds, was lost, whereupon I demanded the yeas division there were—ayes 60, noes 36; and the motion to suspend the and nays, which were ordered, and resulted—yeas 97, nays 30. The Speaker declared that I was entitled to the floor for one hour. A very spirited debate ensued, Mr. Banks and Mr. Bingham opposing the adoption of the resolution and advocating its reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Mr. Eldredge, of Wisconsin, and Mr. Pruyn, of New York, opposed its reference.

I wanted immediate action, and said:

I wanted immediate action, and said:

The time is past when the British lion can trample upon American citizens with impunity. We should not sleep one night upon this matter. We can not stand by and see the flag of the Union made the foot-rug of Europe, British officials seemed to calculate that we would delay the vindication of American citizenship till eternity's bell should ring. This inquiry had been before the Committee on Foreign Affairs eleven months. What has been done? How long must our citizens pine in chains and dungeons before we can get some department to listen to their cry or shed a tear of pity over the clanking of their chains? Six, nine, ten, twelve months have elapsed, and still one hundred American citizens, American soldiers, without crime alleged against them, lie prostrate and helpless this day beneath the foot of this toothless, fangless British lion, and we can not get a vote to look into the matter. There is a bundle of dusty red tape which I want to cut in order to get at something immediately practical and effectual. The chains are on the limbs of American citizens.

The iron of the British despot is pressing on the bones of sovereigns superior to their sovereign, with more brain, more intellect, each one of them, than their sovereign has. And while we adjourn from day to day from our comfortable seats to our plentiful meals and our soft, downy beds, these American citizens, soldiers, heroes, are insulted in every quarter of Great Britain. We seem to be rolling a stone all the time uphill, and before we get it two steps up we are two steps down again. We are eating and drinking and faring sumptuously, and swinging round the circle of fashionable frivolity, while one hundred American citizens, unconvicted and charged with no crime, are to-day pining in cold, damp British jails, badly fed and poorly clothed, while no man is raising a hand to liberate them or a voice to comfort them or a cup of consolation to their quivering lips. I intend, God giving me strength, to press this subject

Mr. Banks, promising prompt action by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, moved to refer the whole subject to that committee. I protested that this would be death to the movement, but it was carried. I called the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and resulted—yeas 80, nays 39, not voting 69. Among those voting with me against the reference were Mr. Beck, of Kentucky; Brooks, of New York; Butler, of Massachusetts; Holman, of Indiana; Judd, of Illinois; Kerr, of Indiana; Lawrence, of Ohio; Pruyn, of New York; Randall, of Pennsylva-

The prisoners were allowed to remain in jail, some for another year, and all were released with broken health, and without remuneration for injuries and outrages inflicted on them.

The next day, February 4, the expatriation bill was again taken up, and four speeches were made upon it.

February 5 and 6 the question was further discussed.

February 10, 1868, the President sent in a lengthy answer to my resolution, including the correspondence on the arrest of our citizens. It was published in two volumes.

February 11 and 12 the bill came up again, and twenty speeches were made.

February 13 the bill was further discussed, and was then referred back to the committee, with many proposed amendments and substi-tutes which had been offered with the intention of having an amended bill matured and reported.

On the 17th of February Mr. Starkweather introduced a bill which dozen or more speeches, passed—yeas 104, nays 4. During the entire debate there was no speech made directly against the bill.

SPEECHES ON THE BILL,

From the Index to the Congressional Globe it appears that among those making more than one speech the following members spoke the number of times set opposite their names:

I may here state that during the entire discussion of this great question in the House of Representatives, James G. Blaine, of Maine, and JOHN A. LOGAN, of Illinois, both prominent members and ready de-baters, neversaid a word upon it. The nearest approach either of them made to a speech was by Mr. LOGAN, who asked me some questions to which I replied.

THE BILL IN THE SENATE.

In three days, April 23, it was reported to the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, consisting of Senators Sumner (chairman), Fessenden, Cameron, Harlan, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, and Johnson. In that committee it slept for two months, till June 23, when it was reported to the Senate.

Irritated at the long delay in the Senate on this bill in demanding the release or retrial of Warren and Costello, on the 15th day of June, 1868, I obtained unanimous consent to offer the following resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby requested by this House to take such measures as shall appear proper to secure the release from imprisonment of Messrs. Warren and Costello, convicted and sentenced in Great Britain for words and acts spoken and done in this country by ignoring our naturalization laws; and to take such other measures as will secure their return to our flag with such ceremonies as are appropriate to the occasion.

LORD STANLEY SURRENDERS

The next day, June 16, 1868, Lord Stanley addressed a note to Mr. Thornton, the English minister at Washington, in which he says that

Her Majesty's Government were prepared to negotiate a naturalization treaty "and no longer hold to the doctrine of indefeasible allegiance." On the 22d of the same month Mr. Secretary Seward addressed a note to Mr. Moran, our chargé d'affaires in London, inclosing my resolution of the 15th, at the request of the President, and calling attention to the bill then pending in the Senate (act of July 27, 1868), which tion to the bill then pending in the Senate (act of July 27, 1868), which had passed the House, requiring the President to make reprisals in case of a denial to naturalized Americans of the rights conceded to native American citizens. Mr. Seward directed that a copy of my resolution and his note should be left, after reading, with Lord Stanley.

Within a week afterward (June 28, 1868) Lord Stanley wrote a note to Mr. Thornton, which he was to show to Mr. Seward, leaving a copy, in which he acknowledges the receipt of Mr. Seward's note and my resolution, and stating that Her Majesty's Government had a sincere desire to dispose of the naturalization question in a manner satisfactory to sire to dispose of the naturalization question in a manner satisfactory to both countries. He tried to answer my resolution by stating that Warren and Costello had cruised along the coast of Ireland with the intent to land men and arms in Ireland. He does not state under what law an American citizen could be punished in England for any intent he might have had while on American soil or on an American deck, if he did not attempt to carry that intention out by any overt act in British

This correspondence may be seen at length in the Washington Daily Chronicle of December 4, 1868. It was copied from English newspapers and was not communicated to Congress by our Government.

Lord Stanley's declaration of England's willingness to surrender England's pet theory of perpetual allegiance to the American doctrine on expatriation and naturalization was cabled to Mr. Sumner, who read it to the Senate.

DISCUSSION IN SENATE.

July 10, Senator Conness, of California, a native of Ireland, succeeded in making the bill the special order for the next Monday, July 13. It came up as a special order, but went over. July 16 and July 17 efforts to take it up proved ineffectual. The committee seemed inclined to let the measure die, but public opinion had grown too strong to be trifled with. In the mean time both of the great political parties had made this question a principal plank in their platforms.

At length, July 18, 1868, it came up for discussion in the Senate and Mr. Sumner led off. The Senate committee had stricken out the House section for reprisals and insisted that the President should report to Congress. Five speeches were made; July 20, four more were made; July 22, eight or ten Senators spoke upon it, including Sumner, Conness, Buckalew, Williams, and Conkling.

July 23, debate continued at great length.

PASSAGE OF THE LAW.

Saturday, July 25, debate was resumed, and Congress was to adjourn Monday, July 27. The vote was taken and the bill passed—yeas 39, nays 5. On the same day it was sent to the House and immediately passed as amended by unanimous vote, and on the 27th of July, 1868, it was signed by President Johnson and became a law.

THE BILL AS PASSED.

As finally passed the bill is the great bulwark of American citizenship in foreign lands. In consequence of its passage treaties were made with us by England, Prussia, and other countries, and if faithfully executed will easily prevent the imprisonment of any innocent American citizen by any foreign government. It was practically ignored by Lowell in the outrages perpetrated on our citizens in 1881–'82. Its full text is as

Whereas the right of expatriation is a natural and inherent right of all people, indispensable to the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and whereas in the recognition of this principle this Government has freely received emigrants from all nations, and invested them with the rights of citizenships and

Whereas in the recognition of this principle this Government has freely received emigrants from all nations, and invested them with the rights of citizenship; and

Whereas it is claimed that such American citizens, with their descendants are subjects of foreign states, owing allegiance to the governments thereof; and Whereas it is necessary to the maintenance of public peace that this claim of foreign allegiance should be promptly and finally disavowed: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That any declaration, instruction, opinion, order, or decision of any officer of this Government which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation is hereby declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of this Government.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted. That all naturalized citizens of the United States, while in foreign states, shall be entitled to, and shall receive from this Government, the same protection of person and property that is accorded to native-born citizens in like situations and circumstances.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted. That whenever it shall be made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been unjustly deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign government, it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to demand of that government the reasons for such imprisonment, and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship the President to use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate such release, and all the facts and proceedings relative thereto shall as soon as practicable be communicated by the President to Congress.

OPINIONS ON THE BILL.

How great and grand this law appears in our history may be seen by few extracts from some of our leading statesmen during its passage through Congress, and afterward on various occasions:

a few extracts from some of our leading statesmen during its passage through Congress, and afterward on various occasions:

Mr. Judd, of Illinois, formerly our minister to Prussia, and well acquainted with the question, addressed the House at length on the 2d day of December, 1867. He said he had listened attentively to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Robrison], and the question was a national one. "The honorand dignity of the nation were involved in the question, and to neglect or delay action upon it as it was now presented would sink this proud country almost out of the list of mations." He concluded his remarks by this expressive sentence:

"To settle this conflict upon the basis of Americanism would possess for me more attraction than the reputation of having purchased a hemisphere. I regard the protection of national clitzenship as far above the acquisition of territory, and so I believe the future historian will write it."

Mr. Wilson, of Iowa (now Senator), chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, in a speech delivered by him January 30, 1868, said:

"We are not now dealing with a mere question of election, nor playing a pleasing game for the votes of naturalized citizens. Whoever views the present occasion through such glasses will greatly mistake the magnitude of the proportions of the subject with which we are dealing. The stern fact that we are breasting the current and immemorial doctrine of most of the nations of the earth respecting the right of expatriation should place us on a higher plane of statesmanship than that which consults merely the present and transient effect of its action."

Speaking of the second section of the bill as it was finally adopted, protecting mative and naturalized citizens alike, Mr. Wilson said:

"Thus far the section challenges the attention and practice of every nation from which we have drawn the foreign element of our population. It is affirmative, agressive, and boldly American. Let this be declared as the policy of his country and no

Godlove S. Orth, of Indiana, long time a member of Congress and a distinguished member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, at a meeting in Cooper Union, New York, held on the 3d day of April, 1882, said:

In 1868 the American Congress formulated for the first time into law the sen timent of protection to American citizens. Now, then, what is that law? It is as sacred to American citizens as any line in the Declaration of Independence. It is as important to the protection of the citizen abroad as the Constitution of the Government is important to the protection of the citizen at home. Under this law we plant ourselves, upon this law we stand, and from this law no power on God's earth can move us. [Tremendous cheering, renewed again and again, the whole audience rising.]

In Barnes's History of the Fortieth Congress my biography was written by Horace Greeley while this measure was pending, and he refers to it in these words:

If this question shall be ultimately settled to the satisfaction of the large class more especially interested, the credit will be largely due to Mr. Robinson's ardent and indetatigable efforts.

And the New York Tribune, under better editorial influences than it now enjoys, published on the 14th of May, 1870, the ratification of the treaty with England, made in pursuance of the law of February 27, 1868. And Mr. Greeley, in his editorial, thus refers to it:

Yesterday's cable telegram informed us that the Royal assent was given to the British naturalization law. Thus England abandons her doctrine of perpetual allegiance and acknowledges the right of expatriation. It should not be forgotten that this measure owes its success in a large measure to WILILIAM E. Rob-INSON, of Brooklyn, who first introduced and urged it through the Fortieth Congress, which Congress deserves the credit of having passed the law.

A. S. HEWITT ON W. E. ROBINSON.

On the 2d day of March, 1882, Hon. ABRAM S. HEWITT, of New York, delivered a speech in this House, from which I make the following ex-

In 1867 American citizens who had gone to Great Britain were seized, brought to trial, convicted, and put in prison. The excitement thus produced in the minds of our adopted citizens resulted in the election of Hon. WILLIAM E. ROBINSON to the Fortieth Congress, for the express purpose of securing such action on the part of the administration and such legislation from Congress as might be necessary for the protection of our naturalized citizens, resident or traveling in foreign lands. And this legislation he succeeded in securing: and after carefully examining the steps by which it was secured, I am prepared to say that he is fully justified in claiming the legislation of 1868 as his work, and in declaring in this House or elsewhere—

Alone I did it. .

ing the steps by which it was secured, I am prepared to say that he is fully justified in claiming the legislation of 1868as his work, and in declaring in this House or elsewhere—

Alone I did it.

He claims no more than his just due when he asserts that prior to this legislation the flexibil declaring in this House or elsewhere. Alone I did it.

He claims no more than his just due when he asserts that prior to this legislation the flexibil declaring European nation, but after our legislation of devirne of political servitude, had not been shandoned, except as the result of the war of 1812, by any leading European nation, but after our legislation of 1868 it was expressly abandoned by all of them; so that in fact the rights of our naturalized them had been asserted in the war of 1812.

In securing this legislation there is a stril whenever my colleague from Brook. Lyn has taken the floor, and the occurrences of the Fortisth Congress. That Congress assembled in extra session on the 4th of March. On the 7th of March Mr. Rourssox introduced the familiar resolution of inquiry, calling upon the President for information as to American citizens held under arrest in Ireland. On the 20th March Secretary Seward sends a letter refusing to furnish the correspondence on the ground that its publication might be detrimental to the publication might be detrimental to the publication might be detrimental to the publication should be a string the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report immediately whether American citizens had been arrested, tried, and convicted or sentenced for words spoken or acts done in the United States. Again there was a seene, but the motion was carried. On the 20th of July the State Department stated to the Committee on Foreign Affairs to wash the motion was carried. On the 20th for July the State Department stated to the Committee on Foreign Affairs that is done on the control of the publication of impeachment against our minister to England, and made a speech in which so culture the resolution of the p teen years of misrepresentation. I can afford to wait for future tributes in coming years for my recent actions, which have been so perseveringly ridiculed, misrepresented, and belied. If these tributes are delayed ridictied, misrepresented, and belied. If these tributes are delayed till after my death they will be appreciated by my children, who have felt with me the great injustice done me by a licentious press.

It is a source of pride to me, and will be to my children, that I was privileged to achieve this great work for mankind, to revolutionize the law of nations, and to establish for the first time in the world's history that a man had a right to himself. Amid the clash of arms in our second war, waged upon this very question, while Decatur, Porter, Rodgers, Stewart, McDonough, Perry, and Blakeley at sea, and Macomb, Brown, and Jackson on land, all Irish, were struggling, at the cost of countless millions of money and thousands of precious lives, to establish the right of expatriation, an Irish boy was born in an humble cottage in Tyrone, who found his way to the Congress of his beloved adopted country, to whom the credit is given of accomplishing what our naval and military heroes whom I have named and our statesmen—Albert Gallatin, Harrison Gray Otis, John C. Calhoun, Nathaniel Macon, Lewis Cass, and Daniel Webster—failed to secure.

With that law on our statute-book and fearlessly administered there would have been no fear of any American citizen ever being held in a foreign prison again, even for one hour, without specific charges being made against him.

My first term in Congress ended on the 4th of March, 1869, and under the same system of misrepresentation about my devoting too much time to Ireland, &c., I did not receive a renomination.

THE FORTY-SEVENTH CONGRESS,

In November, 1880, new troubles for American citizens in Ireland were anticipated, and the people of Brooklyn returned me again to Congress. The administration of James A. Garfield came into power on the 4th of March, 1881, and about that time England, in defiance of our law and of her treaties with us, chose to fill her jails with guiltless American citizens. James Russell Lowell was our minister to England and James G. Blaine was Secretary of State.

Congress was not to assemble till the following December, but a special session of the Senate was called for the 4th of March, 1881, and on the 12th of April, on motion of Senator Burnside of Rhode Island, a resolution was adopted calling upon the President for information touching the arrest and imprisonment of Michael P. Boyton, who claimed to be a citizen of the United States. Mr. Boyton had a passport from the State Department certifying that he was a citizen of the United States. In December, 1880, and January, 1881, he was tried at Dublin, in common with prominent members of Parliament from Ireland and officers of the Irish Land League. officers of the Irish Land League. As definite charges for commission of crime were made against him, and he had a reasonably speedy trial, he made no appeal for protection as an American citizen, and on the 25th of January, 1881, he was acquitted by a disagreement of the jury.

AMERICANS IN PRISON.

On the 2d of March, 1881, two days before the inauguration of Mr. Garfield, the British Parliament passed the "coercion act," which enabled their Government to arrest persons on mere suspicion; and on the 8th of that month, four days after Mr. Garfield's inauguration, Mr. Boyton was again arrested without any intention of trying him for or charging him with crime, but holding him for eighteen months at the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant. He at once telegraphed to Mr. Lowell, demanding the protection of his Government against this outrage, with a written protest against it.

I forbear through shame to go into the delays interposed in this case for a month or more, which time was diligently occupied by our minister and consuls in picking flaws in Mr. Boyton's certificate of citizenship. Our courts had preserve long are decided that in all such assets ship. Our courts had properly long ago decided that in all such cases the certificate was prima facie evidence, and the examination of the detalls how the certificate was obtained should not be allowed to delay proceedings upon it. Mr. Boyton had his passport under the broad seal of the State Department. He had fought in our war and was on that ground entitled to citizenship. His father was naturalized, and had often voted in our elections, as he had done, and was just as much a citizen as James Russell Lowell; and yet the agents of our Government had managed to argue the seal of the State Department off our official documents, to favor the unjust and outrageous acts of the British official documents, to favor the unjust and outrageous acts of the British Government upon our citizenship, and had refused to do anything for Mr. Boyton till this demand for information was made by the Senate.

And not only so, but this resolution which should have had an immediate answer was not even noticed, but was delayed for thirty-eight days, till the last day fixed for the adjournment of the special session, when no action could be taken upon it. And it was never referred to again. There it lies in the Senate without notice of the injustice done to Mr. Boyton.

One would naturally suppose that even if Congress was not in session the Government would take means to protect its citizens abroad. Other citizens had been arrested whose citizenship could not be questioned. ibuted to its success; but so far as it was opposed, it was opposed only by Reiblicans. It owed its final triumph solely to the courage and persistence, in June and July, 1881, Mr. Henry O'Mahony, of Buffalo, John McEnery, and others were arrested, and their cases were brought to the notice of Mr. Lowell. June, July, August, September, October, November, and December of 1881, and January and February of 1882—nine months passed, and yet Mr. Lowell, up to the 22d of February, 1882, made no report to the State Department, and the State Department seemed restful in blissful ignorance of their fate.

In March (3d), 1881, Mr. Joseph B. Walsh, Joseph Dalton, a native citizen of Kenosha, Wis., and others were arrested.

CONGRESS ASSEMBLES.

The Forty-seventh Congress came together on the 5th of December, 1881, and Mr. Keifer, of Ohio, was elected Speaker of the House. No other business being transacted except the election of officers of the Honse.

NUMEROUS ADJOURNMENTS.

On the second day I rose to a question of privilege, but the Speaker ruled that the drawing for seats took precedence, and after the drawing the House adjourned until Friday, the 9th. On the 9th I again sought the floor, but Mr. Robeson, of New Jersey, moved to adjourn again till Tucsday, the 13th. I objected to adjournment, as I had important business to bring before the House. Mr. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, asked if my resolution was so ephemeral that it would not keep till Tuesday, the 13th, and the House adjourned till the 13th. Here was over a week wasted without attempting to attend to any business, and the House refused to listen to the appeal of our imprisoned citizens, whose imprisonment was not ephemeral.

Upon the 13th the day was spent in calling for some thousands of bills. When this business was about half through the call was susbills. When this business was about half through the call was suspended, and Mr. Robeson, of New Jersey, moved to adjourn over three days more, till Friday, the 16th. I objected, and demanded the yeas and nays, but they were refused, and so all business went over; our citizens still in jail without a word of sympathy. It was also agreed that on the 16th the only business to be transacted would be to finish the call of States. I said I had matters of importance (the case of our imprisoned citizens) and I would object to any understanding that precluded me from calling up their cases. Mr. Cox, of New York, said it was too late now to object. I replied that if my objection was too late I would fling it in notwithstanding its lateness.

The House met again on Friday, the 16th, and immediately after the

The House met again on Friday, the 16th, and immediately after the reading of the Journal I said: "I have a resolution here" (the resolution about our imprisoned citizens). Mr. Burrows, of Michigan, called for the regular order, which the Speaker declared took me off the floor. I claimed my resolution as a matter of privilege. The Speaker ruled against me. I then said: against me. I then said:

Our citizens are suffering unjust imprisonment abroad, and yet nobody can be heard in their behalf. The House will hear from me hereafter.

The call of States then proceeded, and when New York was called Mr. Cox presented a resolution of inquiry about our imprisoned citizens, but no statement of their case was allowed, and the matter was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. A petition at an earlier day had been presented by Mr. Upson, of Texas, from citizens of San Antonio, asking Congress to attend to their cases. After the call was completed as far as Rhode Island, the House, on motion of Mr. Robeson, of New Jersey, adjourned till Monday, the 19th. On Monday, the 19th, the call of States was concluded, and on motion of Mr. Robeson, of New Jersey, it was ordered that the House adjourn over till Wednesday, the

On the 21st the House met. The Speaker announced the committees, and after some unimportant business I asked for consent to offer a resolution concerning the imprisonment of our citizens by England. Mr. Robeson, of New Jersey, objected, and so on this 21st day of December, 1881, both Houses adjourned over till Thursday, January 5, 1882, and thus one whole month was wasted; and, although we had nothing else to do, not a moment could be spared for the consideration of the case of innocent citizens suffering unjust imprisonment for months, and Congress steadily neglecting and refusing to devote one minute to the consideration of their wrongs and sufferings.

On the 4th of January, 1884, the House reassembled, and soon after its opening Mr. Robeson again moved an adjournment over till January 9, which was carried.

THE CASE COMES UP.

On the 23d of January the question finally, after so much delay, came before the House. Congress had been in session for eight weeks, our citizens still in prison and no attention given them. Mr. Orth, of Indiana, reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs that they had had certain resolutions, petitions, and memorials before them relating to the artain resolutions, petitions, and memorials before them relating to the arrest of American citizens in Great Britain, and reported a resolution asking the President for information. I took the floor and commenced to speak, but before I concluded the announcement of the death of Senator Burnside came up in order, and the question went over till the 26th of January. On the 26th I continued and concluded my remarks. I referred to the correspondence on protecting American hog products in England while we refused any protection to living American citizens. I quoted from Lord John Russell's interference in the Madiai case in Tuscany: to the case of English prisoners in Abyssinia, where England Tuscany; to the case of English prisoners in Abyssinia, where England burned the capital and killed the king in rescuing her prisoners; to the case of Koszta, &c., and concluded by offering an amendment to Mr. Orth's resolution that the President be requested, if any American citizen is now detained in any British prison, to make the demand provided for in the act of July 27, 1868. I pronounced the other method a humbug. My amendment was ruled out of order, and the resolution was adopted.

THE GREAT DIFFICULTY.

This was the main difficulty. We kept resolving to inquire when we should have been demanding, and the Government kept all the time ignoring the law which, after such exhaustive debate, had been made for this very contingency, and of which the Secretary of State and our minister to England seemed never to have heard. My demand was that the law of July 27, 1868, should be followed and the demand therein provided should be made. Had this been done our citizens would not have been kept in prison one hour. I said the course pursued in inquiring and not acting would require a thousand years to get a fly out of a molasses cup.

The debate was continued, Mr. S. S. Cox, Mr. Orth, Mr. Dunnell, and others taking part in it.

It is a curious fact that Mr. Orth, in ridiculing any attack on London, referred to the safety of London Bridge and the Tower of London recently attacked. It has been shown that if our demand for the release of our prisoners had been denied the destruction of London would not have been so difficult.

WAS THE IMPRISONMENT LEGAL?

In this debate and in the correspondence of the State Department with Mr. Lowell, the false idea was adopted that if England chose to imprison her own citizens on mere suspicion, under the suspension of habeas corpus, she could do the same with ours. This monstrous doctrine I challenged, and in order to have it settled I introduced the following resolution on the 6th of February, 1881:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States is hereby directed to communicate to this House his opinion in writing on the following question: If Joseph Warners Keifer, Speaker of this House, or Alonzo B. Cornell, governor of the State of New York, or Charles Carroll, a laborer in the department of public works in the city of New York, being a citizen of the United States, visit any part of the British Empire, and should there be arrested without having committed any crime, and without any definite charge of crime being alleged against him, could the English Government, by suspending the habeas corpus, or otherwise, lawfully detain him indefinitely on suspicion, without trial or without any right in our Government to demand his release? Also his opinion on the application of the law of July 27,1868, to such cases, and the President's duty under it.

The idea that England could arrest and keep in prison indefinitely, without trial, any of our distinguished citizens—say the Speaker of the House, or a governor of a State, or the humblest citizen of the Republic—who had committed no crime, by suspending law and proclaiming the district in which he was found, was so monstrous that I introduced this resolution, which was most sensible and timely. Had it been adopted and had the Attarney General answered it as it deserved to adopted, and had the Attorney-General answered it as it deserved to be answered, our citizens would have been instantly released. The Anglicised press, however, chose to pour its senseless ribaldry upon the resolution and upon its author; and on the 14th of February Mr. Orth, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported it back with a recommendation to lay it on the table. On a division the vote stood—yeas 85, nays 45; from which it appeared that there were only forty-five members of the House caring enough for our citizens to inquire into the legality of their cruel imprisonment.

Mr. Cox and myself demanded the yeas and nays. They were or-02. When the dered, and resulted in the affirmative—yeas 117, nays 102. When the members could escape being put on record there were two to one against this very timely resolution, but when they had to go on record 102 voted against smothering the inquiry, and it was carried by a majority of 15. I give the yeas and nays without comment, as follows:

So the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs was agreed to.

The Democrats voting with the Republicans were 25; the Republicans voting with the Democrats, 18. Had the 25 Democrats voted with ans voting with the Democrats, 18. Had the 25 Democrats voted with the great majority of their party the vote would have been—yeas 92, nays 127. Why these Democrats voted against their party I never could understand. The British minister here and the English Government interpreted it to mean that Congress did not really care whether Irish-American citizens were insulted or not. And the British minister thought it of importance enough to communicate my resolution and the vote "tabling" the same, which he informs his lordship was the same as killing it, in a special dispatch the very day the English victory was achieved in this House.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

About this time the country became fully aroused to the importance

About this time the country became rully aroused to the importance of this question, and petitions, resolutions, and remonstrances came into Congress by the hundred. Meetings were held in all the leading cities of the Union and resolutions passed and forwarded to Congress.

At the meeting held in Buffalo, April 9, 1882, the chair was taken by Grover Cleveland, then the mayor of that city and now elected President of the United States. To that meeting I had been invited, both by letter and telegram, but could not get away from my duties here. In opening that meeting Mr. Cleveland took the correct ground and announced the American doctrine as follows:

We have a right to say and we do say that mere suspicion, without examina-tion or trial, is not sufficient to justify the long imprisonment of a citizen of America. Other nations may permit their citizens to be thus imprisoned. Ours

That is in glorious contrast to the monstrous doctrine allowed to dominate our diplomacy under Mr. Lowell:—that England by proclaiming a district in which she could find an American citizen might hold him on suspicion, without legal charge or trial, at her discretion or the will of the lord-lieutenant.

Many of the State Legislatures also passed resolutions, particularly New York, New Jersey, Illinois, &c., most of them mentioning me by name. Many of these resolutions were published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In the issue of March 17, 1882, appeared the following from my own city of Brooklyn:

DEAR SIE: I have been instructed by the executive committee of the Land League of Brooklyn to inform you of their cordial and hearty approval of your action in regard to the incarceration of American citizens in British dungeons. May God speed you in your noble and heroic struggle. Please convey to the Representatives who have so ably sustained you our sincere and heartfelt thanks, and assure them that they, as you, shall ever retain a place in the hearts of all true Irishmen.

JAMES DIXON, Secretary,

Hon, WILLIAM E. ROBINSON.

The convention of delegates from the various Land League branches of Boston and vicinity, in March, 1882-

Resolved, That our thanks are eminently due and are cordially tendered to Hon. W. E. ROBINSON for his noble and manly exertions to obtain the release of American citizens now incarcerated in British prisons.

DELAY IN COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

By a rule of the House all resolutions of inquiry from the President and heads of Departments shall be reported back within one week. The resolution asking information from the State Department about our imprisoned citizens was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs our imprisoned citizens was referred to the Committee on Foreign Anairs on the 23d of January, 1882. On the 14th day of February it was brought before the House and recommitted to the committee with instructions. That committee consisted of Messrs. Williams of Wisconsin (chairman), Orth, Kasson, RICE of Massachusetts, Dunnell, Lord, Walker, BLOUNT, Wilson, DEUSTER, and BELMONT.

The week passed, a month passed, and no notice was taken of it, while many of our citizens pined away dreary lives in British prisons. I did not desire to make myself too conspicuous, and should have preferred to have others move in the matter, but as no one did so I called up the matter on the 24th of March, 1882, and stated that if something were not soon done I should move to impeach our minister. At the request of members of the committee the matter was laid over.

On the 4th of April the President sent us a reply to the House resolution of January 31, with a letter from Secretary Frelinghuysen, and it contained just ten lines as printed in the RECORD, informing us that the negotiations had been "conducted in a spirit of entire friendship." The cruel incarceration of our innocent citizens did not create a ripple on the surface of our placidity! The next day, April 5, the President favored us with a larger installment of information in reply to our resolution.

Upon the 14th of April, 1882, Senator Voorhees, of Indiana, made an eloquent speech on the case of Daniel McSweeney. The resolution which he offered and spoke upon was never afterward referred to.

which he offered and spoke upon was never afterward referred to.

April 22, 1882, came on and no report from the committee on the resolution of January 23. I had now waited another month, and as no one else took it up I asked, for information, how long we were to wait, and said, "This House is despised; the Government of England despises this country; what are we to do?" and I moved to discharge the committee and bring the matter before the House:

That committee is bound by our rules to report in one week. They have had it now three months before them, and we can not get a report, while our citizens are still in British jails.

On the 24th of April I again brought up the motion to discharge the committee and have the House act upon it immediately. At the request of the committee I allowed it to go over till the next day.

April 25 I brought up the subject again, and was antagonized by a contested-election case (Lynch against Chalmers). That question was voted down, and I again renewed my motion. Mr. Kasson and others contended that my motion was not privileged and therefore not in orcontended that my motion was not privileged and therefore not in or-der, and Mr. Kasson raised the question of consideration. On a division there were 59 for considering my motion as a privileged question and 78 against it. I called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and here a curious fact developed itself. Whereas I could only get 59 on a mere division, upon the yeas and nays, where every one was bound to put himself on record, I had 144 in my favor and only 62 against me.

ANOTHER FIELD DAY.

The question now came squarely for discussion, and we had a field day in the House. I spoke at length, and my speech was printed in pamphlet form and extensively circulated. It was of course ridiculed by the Anglicised part of our population, but it was liked by those who cherish American ideas. I was followed by Mr. Cox, of New York, and Mr. Orth, of Indiana. The principal part of Mr. Orth's speech was devoted to throwing doubts on the citizenship of O'Mahony, and yet in that speech he read a letter from our consul at Cork, dated June 22, 1881, ten months before, stating that he had seen and forwarded to 22, 1881, ten months before, stating that he had seen and forwarded to our minister at London the naturalization papers of Mr. O'Mahony. What better proof of his citizenship was required? Nobody doubted their genuineness. It was said that O'Mahony held the position of poorlaw guardian in Ireland, and that holding any such position was proof against his citizenship; while it is well known that Mr. Lowell himself holds a position under the British laws and was elected at his own wish lord rector of a British university. Is he therefore not a citizen of the United States?

I think it not out of place to say here that I had a statement of O'Mahony's case from himself, sent to me with the request that I would lay it before Congress, which I tried several times to do, but was relay it before Congress, which I tried several times to do, but was refused even to have it printed in the RECORD, on the objection of an Englishman who was then a Representative from Vermont in this House.

Mr. Orth was followed by Mr. DEUSTER, the German member from Wisconsin, by Mr. Williams of Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, who suggested that the Gladstone government might be willing to grant our wishes concerning these prisoners, but were afraid of English sentiment, which placed them "between the devil and the deep sea." He delivered a fervent eulogy on Ireland, praising her virtues and picturing her wrongs, and said some complimentary things of myself. Mr. De Motte of Indiana, Mr. BLOUNT of Georgia, Mr. WILSON of West Virginia, and Mr. Lord of Michigan followed. followed.

Mr. WILSON referred to the Eisenstrick affair between Germany and Nicaragua in 1876-'77 and 1878, in which, for less provocation than in these cases, Nicaragua was compelled to apologize, to salute the German flag, and pay $30,000. In this case the United States acted as arbitrator, but in our own case we did not demand a salute of our flag nor compensation to our citizens.

Mr. BLOUNT, of Georgia, in his speech referred to myself, and said: I believe that the agitation in this House by that gentleman [Mr. Robinson] has produced speedy action on the part of this administration. I believe that for months before the matter had been allowed to lag.

At the conclusion of the debate the original resolution was modified by Mr. Cox to the satisfaction of all parties and unanimously adopted. Thus my proposition to discharge the committee and adopt the resolution was successful.

It was at the conclusion of my speech that, after hearing the demands that were to be made and the successful issues to be anticipated, I indulged in this flight of fancy:

When I came here I found the American Eagle drugged and drowsy, his blood poisoned with political pyemia, his beak filled with Lowell garbage, and his pinions wet with the mildew of monarchy. I roused him from his ignoble slumber, I brushed the mildew from his plumage, I gave his majestic voice to the music of liberty, and his imperial wing to fan the tempest and soar to the

GLADSTONE PERPLEXED.

The pressure in the House of Representatives and the action taken thereunder by the President led to the relief of Ireland by the resignation of the lord-lieutenant and of Buckshot Foster. The Washington Post in its issue of May 6, 1882, remarked editorially:

Hon. WILLIAM E. ROBINSON, of New York, is a very modest man; otherwise he might claim the distinction of having forced the British Government to a change of policy.

Whether this remark was intended seriously or otherwise, there is a heap of truth in it.

The killing of Cavendish and Burke on that day was a terrible reverse to these feelings of triumph. It emboldened the oppressors of Ireland. It strengthened the Gladstone government and enabled it to hold on to power and to continue its insults to our citizens. Had it not been for their death our action on that 25th of April would have resulted in the unconditional release of our citizens and the destruction of Gladstone's administration.

On the 15th of May, 1882, I again brought the case of our prisoners before the House, who were still retained in prison, and inquired whether degrading offers had been made to our imprisoned citizens to accept their liberation on insulting conditions.

On the 23d of May the President sent some additional information

On the 20th day of June, 1882, the committee having failed to report my resolution of May 15, I gave notice that if it was not soon reported I would move to take it from the committee and have it acted on in the House. I also mentioned that while in our great debate of April 25 we were told that only two American citizens were in prison, and that they would soon be discharged, there were now nine of our citizens lingering in British jails without charge of crime or hope of trial. On the 28th of June Mr. Orth reported a resolution from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, as a substitute for mine of June 15, calling on the President for additional information, and inquiring whether any proposition had been made by any person holding office under our Government to any American citizen in British prisons to accept release upon conditions.

Mr. Orth moved the previous question, on which I called for the yeas and nays; but they were refused, and, under the rule, fifteen minutes only were allowed to each side.

THE BIGHT THING AT LAST.

Mr. Wilson occupied the half of the time allowed to the opposition, but as an improvement for the first time offered the resolution for which I had been all the time contending, to request the President to demand the release of our prisoners under the law of July 27, 1868.

Mr. Wilson was a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and had the committee's consent to offer his resolution as his own but not as a resolution of the committee. At the suggestion of Mr. McLane, of Maryland, he omitted the words, "not amounting to an act of war," which are in the statute of July 27, 1868.

At the conclusion of Mr. Wilson's remarks I was allowed seven and a half minutes, which I indignantly declined, and denounced the frivolous conduct of our Government.

Mr. Wilson's resolution was passed unanimously. At a later hour he seems to have become frightened with the boldness and propriety of his own resolution, or to have been asked by others to modify the language by adding "in accordance with such precedents and usages as exist between the two governments." Where he got this phrase I do not know, but I know it is not in the law of July 27, 1868, and I objected and recovered it properties and a weakening in the face of the jected and pronounced it nonsense and a weakening in the face of the enemy. Mr. Williams, chairman of the committee, said it was important if not vital, and the words were added. Without the modifications it was the only sensible resolution of the kind that had been of-It was the resolution I wanted from the first, but for which I could not get a hearing. It was adopted, but no reply was ever made

BRITISH INSOLENCE.

On the 3d of July, 1881, I introduced a resolution asking information from the Secretary of State relating to the conduct of the British min-ister in relation to the proceedings in Congress touching the imprisonment of our citizens in British jails.

It was an important resolution and should have been adopted. The British minister had actually gone to the Secretary's office to express not only his disgust with my pertinacity, but to question the conduct of Mr. Orth and of the House in passing resolutions distasteful to him and disrespectful to England. This insolence should have been noticed and rebuked. On the 25th of January, the day I made my first speech on the subject, Minister West wrote to Lord Granville as follows:

I called Mr. Frelinghuysen's attention to the terms of this resolution and to the language used in debate upon it. I remarked to Mr. Frelinghuysen that although not much importance need be attached to such language as that used by Mr. Rosinsox, still the wording of the resolution was calculated to produce a bad effect and might cause unnecessary irritation.

Imagine what Lord Granville would have said if our minister had gone to him to browbeat him for any speech made or resolution adopted in the House of Commons.

In the House of Commons.

Yet so little notice was taken of this insolence except by myself that the committee never reported it back, and the Anglified press of the country, including the New York World, then claiming to be a Democratic organ and edited I believe by William H. Hurlbert, roundly abused me for daring to question the English minister's right to supervise our legislation, and that New York World, in its issue of July 4, 1882, took occasion to assure the British minister that I was of no importance—the very idea that West had previously communicated to Granville; and that same World, on that same national holiday, suggested that the press agent in Washington should suppress all mention of my doings. This idea was the last resort of the Anglified editors, which was in some respects afterward carried out, and wisely, too, for which was in some respects afterward carried out, and wisely, too, for as long as the press published what I did, no matter how they abused me, the American people approved of it and I could well afford to let the Anglo-maniacs rave.

MORE RESOLUTIONS.

On the 17th of July, 1882, Mr. Cox and myself both presented resolutions of inquiry concerning our imprisoned citizens, Mr. Cox's inquiring more particularly about Mr. McSweeney. Mine was as follows:

quiring more particularly about Mr. McSweeney. Mine was as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby respectfully but urgently requested to inform this House when it may expect an answer to its resolution of June 28—now twenty days ago—adopted unanimously, calling for any additional information not heretofore communicated to Congress relative to our citizens still suffering unjust imprisonment in British jails; and whether any proposition has been made to any American citizens to accept their release upon conditions; and whether he has yet made the demand which this House upon conditions; and whether he has yet made the demand which this House upon conditions; and whether he has yet made the demand which this House upon the report all the facts and proceedings as soon as practicable in compliance with the imperative provisions of the law of July 27, 1868; and whether any correspondence has taken place with James Russell Lowell—nominally our minister to Great Britain, but really doing police duty and detective work under Lord Granville in discovering imperfections in certificates of American citizenship, even when certified under seal of our courts and State Department—relative to his resignation or recall, as requested by numerous petitions and resolutions presented to this House from the principal cities and States in the Union.

The same day July 17, Lake introduced the following additional

The same day, July 17, I also introduced the following additional resolution:

Resolved. That the Secretary of State is hereby directed to inform this House whether he can not now communicate the telegrams relating to our citizens in British prisons, the publication of which was thought to be incompatible with the public interest as expressed in his letter to the President of April 5, 1882, and that he is hereby directed to communicate every item of correspondence relating to these citizens, by mail or cable, not hitherto communicated, which, even if their publication may be deemed incompatible with the public interest, may be considered in secret session of this House or of its Committee on Foreign Affairs.

These resolutions of Mr. Cox and myself were referred to the Committee of Foreign Affairs, and from that chamber of somnolency they never returned, and of course neither President nor Secretary felt called upon to give information.

INCOMPATIBLE WITH PUBLIC GOOD.

One of the monarchical ideas that have crept into our legislation is, that on resolutions of inquiry the phrase is introduced "if not incompatible with the public welfare." I fought against this phrase, and kept it out of my resolutions.

kept it out of my resolutions.

How ridiculous it is! Who has the right to judge of the public good if not the representatives of the people? The President is chosen as the head servant of the people; the Secretaries are his assistant servants of the people. Suppose the master of any establishment wants to examine into its affairs and asks the employes for information, and they should inform him that it is incompatible with the good of the establishment to communicate it! Congress is the master of all public business, including the public welfare, and they, not the President or his assistants, should judge what is or is not compatible with that public welfare. There is provision made for secret sessions of the House as well as of the Senate, and there all questions of compatibility to the public interests should be decided. public interests should be decided.

THE LAST EFFORTS.

On the 5th of August, 1882, the President sent his last message of the subject to the House. It was in answer to the resolution of this House of June 28. It should have been answered in twenty-four hours. but over five weeks were taken, and it was not sent in till Saturday af ternoon, August 5, and Congress was to adjourn on Tuesday, the 7th Of course no further notice was taken of it for that session, and no no tice has been taken since, except the resolution which I am now trying to get this House to rescue from the Committee on Foreign Affairs before this Congress also goes into history.

In that last message the President informed us that four citizens still remained in prison—O'Mahoney, McSweeney, Slattery, and Gannon, the last named an American by birth; and we have no official information how, when, or on what terms they were released, or whether they were released at all. McSweeney got out, at any rate, for we saw him here during the last election, but no member of this House knows anything about the release of the others.

DISHONORING OUR OWN RECORD.

During the whole dreary discussion of this subject every one of these seventeen prisoners produced passports, or naturalization papers, and in every case, even in the cases of native citizens, months were spent in diligent efforts to pick flaws in their title to citizenship. Had Decatur withheld his demand to the Dey of Algiers, or Captain Ingraham his demand on the commander of the Austrian man-of-war for the liberation of our citizens till the archives of our country were searched for proof of the regularity of the papers of their citizenship, the most brilliant passages of our diplomatic history would never have been written.

You may take all the cases in history where any nation has found any of its citizens imprisoned in foreign countries and you can not find any of its citizens imprisoned in foreign countries and you can not find any but our own which permitted the transgressing party to delay action by raising these quibbles. Mr. Boyton's claim was more easily proved than Mr. Blaine's would be. Mr. Boyton had the undoubted seal of the United States to prove his citizenship. Mr. Blaine could produce no proof that he was born here. What would he say if he were arrested in a foreign country and thrown into a loathsome prison and his Government refused to ask his release or speedy trial till they could spend some fourteen or eighteen months in hunting family Bibles or church records to ascertain his place of birth?

MISREPRESENTATIONS OF THE PRESS.

In my efforts in the Forty-seventh Congress to achieve the liberation of our citizens, as well as in my efforts to establish the great American doctrine of expatriation and naturalization, for which Mr. Hewitt so fully gives me credit, the Anglified press kept prating about my wasting the time of Congress in talking on Ireland. It will probably astonish those who read these remarks that during the entire four years of my service in the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses, now closing, I have not spoken a single word upon any Irish subject. My speeches were all on great American subjects.

One of the silly stories told about me was that I had remarked, on one occasion, that I did not care tostay in the House because there was nothing going on there except some American business. Now, I believe I was foremost in opposing everything that was not American. I opposed the conferring of foreign decorations; I was opposed to thanking foreign despots for presents sent to us; I opposed all measures that were not truly American, and several foolish efforts to legislate for the benefit of foreign potentates are now hung up in the House on my objection; such as thanking England for the Alert.

jection; such as thanking England for the Alert, &c.

IRELAND-WHY LOVE HEE?

But even if I had devoted some time to Ireland, we could hardly call her interests foreign subjects.

I confess that I have a warm spot in my heart for Ireland. Into that heart two eyes of Irish blue are ever looking. I have bathed my soul in her sorrows and flooded my memory with her sufferings. In fifty years absence from her I have felt increasing love for her, and the palpitations of her heart have the suffering to the palpitations of her heart have the suffering to the suffering that her the suffering the sufferin You ask me why I, as an American, love her? I reply I could not be an American unless I did love her.

There is a fearful amount of woful or willful ignorance among our There is a fearful amount of world or willful ignorance among our younger population in regard to the Irish element in this country and its services in the cause of our country. There is a moral deafness to her claims which must not be allowed to grow into a national disease. There were two parties in the Revolution, as there are now—the friends of England, who were the enemies of our independence, and the friends of Washington, who were mostly Irish and their descendants. At the of Washington, who were mostly Irish and their descendants. At the Declaration of Independence I presume the Irish element was about two-thirds of our population. The people of New England had a strong infusion of Irish blood, which wrote its name in red letters at Lexington and Bunker Hill, at Bennington and Saratoga.

The English element were almost all against us. Fifteen hundred of them were driven to sea by Washington at Boston, on St. Patrick's Day, in 1776. The Irish troops from New Hampshire, Massachusetts (including Maine), New York, Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, North Carolina, and South Carolina, indeed from all the States or colonies, flocked to Washington's army, and the illustrious generals who stood Carolina, and South Carolina, indeed from all the States of colonies, flocked to Washington's army, and the illustrious generals who stood around him were mostly Irish. A little Irish society in Philadelphia, of some hundred members, known as "The Friendly Sons of St. Patrick," furnished Washington more generals than all the descendants of the Mayflower, and of this society, composed exclusively of Irishmen, George Washington was a member, having been naturalized to fit him for membership. This incident shows how Washington loved the Irish and won his way into their society by becoming an adopted son of St. Patrick. Let us look at our Revolutionary battlefields and see what brilliant Irish officers were around Washington in every battle for our Independence. Here the Irish won the love of every true American and the hatred of every worshiper of England.

Richard Montgomery, the first general of the continental army that rectard Montgomery, the first general of the continental army that fell in the cause of American liberty. He was born in Convoy Castle, near the town of Raphoe, in County Donegal. His father's name was Thomas. He had two brothers, Alexander and John, and one sister, who married Lord Ranelagh. His brother Alexander represented the county for many years in the Irish parliament. I shall not pretend to sketch the life or services of General Montgomery. He came here in 1772 and married the eldest daughter of Chancellor Livingston, one of the great American family descended from old John Livingston, the Irish Presbyterian preacher. In 1789, thirteen years after her husband's death, this beautiful, gifted, and amiable lady visited Ireland to see Convoy Castle, on the banks of the Finn, now dear to her as her own Hudson. Her country had taken its place among the nations of the earth. Its liberator had just been inaugurated its first President, taking the oath of office before her father.

The rebels had become the heroes of history and Washington's name The rebels had become the heroes of history and Washington's name was everywhere almost idolatrously mentioned. Washington had furnished her with letters to distinguished persons in Europe, among others to Sir Edward Newenham, an Irish gentleman and a member of the Irish Parliament, who, on the death of Montgomery, appeared in Parliament and at levees in full mourning, to express his Irish sympathy with the then detested Revolution, and who presided at a public meeting in Dublin, held to reprobate and stop sending the military of the kingdom to the colonies and "hiring the Hessians and Hanoverians from the carcass butchers of Germany." and who had gathered in his elegant the carcass butchers of Germany," and who had gathered in his elegant house in Dublin, in an apartment called his "American room," busts and pictures of Washington and other illustrious Americans, with Arnold's picture reversed and his treason written under it. Into this room Sir Edward introduced Mrs. Montgomery, which gave her much satisfaction. She had sent him Washington's letter, and he and Lady Newenham called upon her at Lord Ranelagh's, twelve miles from Dublin, and pressed her to accept the hospitality of their home, which she promised to do after visiting her gallant husband's relatives, whose descendants still own the grand old castle of Convoy.

The Duke of Leinster and the illustrious Lord Charlemont waited upon her. General Massey, with whom her husband was well acquainted at the first siege of Quebec, promptly paid his respects to her, and everywhere, particularly in Ireland, she was received with honor and homage. I think it a disgrace to America that the representatives of this grand Irish family, which furnished the first and grandest martyr to American liberty, should not have been invited with other welcome but less worthy guests to the grand centennial celebration of the crowning glory of Yorktown. It was but a poor return for the cordiality of that Irish hospitality that welcomed and worshiped the illustrious widow of our glorious American general.

MORE IRISH NAMES.

Alfred Moore, of North Carolina, afterward appointed by Washington judge of the Supreme Court.

James Moore, commanded at the battle of Moore's Bridge, North Carolina.

Daniel Morgan, the renowned hero of the Cowpens, born July 4, 1736, at Ballinasceen, in the County Derry, distinguished at the capture of Burgoyne. Trumbull puts him conspicuous in his picture of that event.

Stephen Moylan, one of five brothers, four of them dedicated to George Washington, the other to God and Ireland, as the Catholic bishop of Cork; founder of Moylan's Dragoons; a fine cavalry officer. Morgan and Hand of the rifles, Knox of the artillery, Moylan of the cavalry all Irish.

Timothy Murphy, whose rifle brought down Frazer and saved the day at Stillwater.

Andrew Pickens served at Cowpens and Eutaw, married the celebrated beauty, Rebecca Calhoun, aunt of John C. Calhoun; his son and grandson governors of South Carolina.

Andrew Porter fought at Trenton, Princeton, Brandywine, and Germantown; received on the field of Germantown the thanks of Washington. His sons George B., governor of Michigan, David R., governor of Pennsylvania, and James M., Secretary of War in Tyler's Cabinet. His family giving the United States commodores, admirals, statesmen, and soldiers.

David Ramsay, historian, surgeon, and soldier in the war. brother Nathaniel stayed disaster at Monmouth.

George Reed fought at Bunker Hill, Trenton, and Saratoga, and suffered at Valley Forge. His father-in-law, John Woodburn, was Horace Greeley's great-grandfather.

Joseph Reed was a great lawyer, a wise statesman, and a brave soldier. His grandfather came from Ireland to New Hampshire, and then to Trenton, N. J., where Joseph was born. His father, Andrew, was a Philadelphia merchant. Before the Revolution he wrote a series of able letters to Lord Dartmouth, giving the American view of the question. July 4, 1775, one year before the Declaration, he was appointed Washington's secretary at Cambridge, and remained the most confidential friend of Washington through the war. When he was away Washington would beg of him to return, as he knew no other person with whom he could live in unbounded confidence. Washington could find no other who could grasp the great problems with which he had to struggle, and he was in distress for want of him. It was to he had to struggle, and he was in distress for want of him. him that Washington, in the dark days, unbosomed himself to say that he wished he had, in place of accepting the chief command, retired to the back country and lived in a wigwam, if in doing so he could have justified himself to his conscience and to posterity.

Washington always had great faith in the Irish settlers of Western Virginia, and at one time said, if beaten along the whole seaboard he could retire to the mountains and there maintain the cause of freedom against the world. Washington went to Philadelphia in May, 1776, and induced Congress to appoint Reed adjutant general, and as such he joined Washington in June in New York. It was he that refused to receive Lord Howe's letter to Washington unless it was properly addressed. He helped Washington in conducting the retreat from Long Island. He refused to leave the Commander-in-Chief in his difficulties, even when his wife Esther, whom he adored, wrote to him to come to her in sickness. In the retreat across New Jersey and at Trenton and Princeton Colonel Reed's services were conspicuous and valuable. was he who at Washington's request reconnoitered the enemy before the battle of Princeton with six officers, chosen for their bravery and fidelity, including John Dunlap and James and Samuel Caldwell, natives of Ireland and members of St. Patrick Society. It was a bold and hazardous undertaking, but successfully performed, and the seven horsemen returned with twelve British dragoons, captured almost in sight of men returned with twelve British dragoons, captured almost in signt of the British army. He was elected by Congress as brigadier-general, which he refused, but served, acting without rank or pay. He was chosen the first chief-justice of the State of Pennsylvania. This he declined and staid in the Army. He was again elected to Congress, and visited Valley Forge and made important reports to Congress. It was to him that the British commissioners offered $50,000 and any office in the colonies in the gift of His Majesty if he would desert the then almost headers are the British company of the British conditions and that the British conditions are the statement of the British conditions and the british conditions are the statement of the British conditions and the british conditions are the statement of the statement most hopeless cause of the Revolution, and that everything should be granted to the colonists except independence, and it was this grand Irish-American patriot that returned the noble answer:

I am not worth purchasing; but such as I am the King of Great Britain is not rich enough to do it.

That answer was given on a Sunday evening, at Philadelphia. The next morning Reed joined his friend Colonel Moylan, the Catholic Irishman from Cork, and with his dragoons crossed to Jersey and reconnoitered the rear of the splendid British army. News had come from Catholic France that her army and navy would be allied to ours. The gloom was lifted from Valley Forge. Washington's army again crossed the Delayance and in one week of the Peach had informed the Points. the Delaware, and in one week after Reed had informed the British commissioners that all the gold in England could not bribe one Irish American patriot to betray the cause of freedom he was in the thickest American patriot to betray the cause of freedom he was in the thickest of the fight at Monmouth, where Washington, on the 28th of June, 1778, informed His Majesty's general, through the roar of Irish Knox's artillery, the crack of Irish Morgan's rifles, the sweeping charge of Irish Moylan's dragoons, and the flashing foam of Irish Wayne's bayonets, that all the forces of the British Government could not crush the onets, that all the forces of the British Government could not crush the cause of Irish American liberty.

The three tempting offers that England made to Barry, Morgan, and Reed, all Irish, were all rejected. The fourth she made to Benedict Arnold, and it was accepted. In December, 1779, Reed was, by unanimous vote of both branches of the State government, elected president of the State of Pennsylvania, and was thrice re-elected, and it was in his presidency that Pennsylvania, the first of all the States, abolished slavery by a bill the inimitable language of which was from his pen. His epitaph, written by Washington's Attorney-General, truly characterizes this great Irishman's life as "active, useful, and glorious."

MORE HEROES.

Griffith Rutherford, a brave Revolutionary general, was born in Ireland and settled in North Carolina. He commanded a brigade at the battle of Camden. He emigrated to Tennessee and was president of its Legislative Council. North Carolina and Tennessee each named a county after him.

Thomas Robinson, a native of Ireland and resident of Delaware, a brother-in-law of Anthony Wayne, served in the Revolution as a brigadier-general. He was, I believe, the first American officer that appeared in his American uniform at Drury Lane Theater. He was received with cheers. A few moments afterward an officer in British uniform appeared in an adjoining box, and was received with hisses. It was Benedict Arnold.

John Smilie, born at Newtonards, in Ireland, served in the Revolution, was a member of Congress for twenty years. He was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs that reduced the time for naturalization from fourteen to five years, and who recommended the declaration of the second war with England.

The Smith family in the Revolutionary Army were generally Irishamong them the presidents of Hampden Sidney, Princeton, and Union colleges-Samuel Smith, captain in the Revolutionary war and major, general in the second, Madame Patterson Bonaparte's uncle, and Representative and Senator in Congress, and mayor of Baltimore at the age of eighty-four.

Richard D. Spaight, born in Ireland, fought at Camden-member of Congress, and governor or North Carolina.

STARK AND SULLIVAN.

John Stark, born in New Hampshire, his father being one of the first colony that settled at Derry, in that State. In looks, gesture, wit, and brogue John Stark was as Irish as if he had been brought up in Tyrone or Cork. I have often listened to Daniel Webster imitating John Stark's Irish brogue. When Jared Sparks, in 1834, commenced the publication of his American biography, he very properly selected this Irish-American hero and patriot as the first subject, and the biography is by Edward Everett. His parents were married in Ireland. He had seen long and severe service before the Revolution; but he entered the seen long and severe service before the Revolution; but he entered the contest with the experience of age and the vehemence of youth. He fought at Bunker Hill. At Trenton he led the van of the right wing, under General Sullivan. He fought at Princeton; but it was at Bennington, August 16,1777, that he erowned himself with immortal glory. That victory revived the drooping spirit of the country and led to greater victories. He was one of the oldest generals that entered the Revolutionary army, and was the last survivor but one (Sumter), and in 1822, at the age of 94, he died.

Walter Stewart was known as the "boy colonel" and the handsomest officer in the Revolutionary Army. He was born at Derry, in somest officer in the Revolutionary Army. He was born at Derry, in Ireland. He so thoroughly enjoyed the friendship of Washington that jealous rivals thought his promotion was due to partiality. He was colonel at twenty-one and afterward brigadier-general.

John Sullivan was one of the master minds and great generals of the war. He had two brothers, Ebenezer and Daniel. When the war commenced Daniel had two saw-mills in Maine, in what is now known as the town of Sullivan. To prevent the enemy from getting these mills he set fire to them and went into the war for American independence.

These O'Sullivans trace their heroic deeds back to days before the These O'Sullivans trace their heroic deeds back to days before the commencement of the Christian era. To their antique glory the English nobility are but mushrooms or toadstools. In the seventh century they were kings in Ireland. Philip O'Sullivan, of Ardra, was an officer in the Irish army at the seige of Limerick, and went with Sarsfield to France. His son John, born in the county of Limerick, 1692, came to America in 1723. On the way over he became acquainted with a young lady from the County Cork. They got married and settled in Maine, and called the place where they settled Limerick, where they died, he at the age of 106, she five years after him. They became the parents of four illustrious American patriots, Ebenezer and Daniel, already mentioned, and James, the eminent attorney-general and afterward the governor of the State of Massachusetts. John was their third son. He was a delegate to the first Continental Congress, and, only that his sword was wanted in the field, would have been a signer of the Declaration of Independence. He and John Langdon in 1774 only that his sword was wanted in the field, would have been a signer of the Declaration of Independence. He and John Langdon in 1774 seized the military stores at Fort William and Mary, afterward Fort Sullivan, at the entrance to the harbor at Portsmouth, N. H. This was the first military exploit in the Revolution, and, had it not been for the powder thus secured, Bunker Hill, which, for want of it, was a partial defeat, would have been an impossibility or a disaster. The first engagements in the Revolution atsea and on land were commanded first engagements in the Revolution at sea and on land were commanded by O'Brien and O'Sullivan. He was afterward, in 1775, sent back to Congress with his compatriot, John Langdon, who gave his plate and Tobago rum to enable John Stark, another Irishman, to conquer at Bennington, but he soon dropped the quill pen at Philadelphia for the steel pen of Bunker Hill and Trenton. After the fall of our Irish Montgomery and the death of his successor, Thomas, the command devolved on General Thompson, also Irish, and on the 4th of June, 1776, General Sullivan took command, the third Irishman who had chief command of the northern division of the Continental Army.

In Angust, 1776, he fought at the battle of Long Island. He was temporarily in command; but General Putnam coming with re-enforcements ranked him and took command. He was taken prisoner and afterward exchanged. In the retreat across New Jersey General Sulliafterward exchanged. In the retreat across New Jersey General Sullivan succeeded Lee and effected a junction with Washington. At the battle of Trenton Washington himself took command of one of the two columns and put Sullivan at the head of the other. Victory followed and Princeton succeeded, and Sullivan was there, again conspicuous and ington put him in command of his own and Wayne's divisions, and those two Irish generals had the advantage of the British troops till the other wing failed. They received the thanks of Washington. other wing failed. They received the thanks of Washington. He was chief in command in Rhode Island and in the expedition against the Indians, over whom he gained a signal victory in 1779. He was afterward sent to Congress again, was attorney-general and president (thrice elected) of New Hampshire, and subsequently appointed United States judge by his old friend Washington, which he remained till his death in 1795. Much of the best blood of New England, in law, literature, and medicine, came from this Limerick family.

William Thompson, born in Ireland, commanding eight companies of Pennsylvania riflemen, joined Washington in August, 1775; was commander of the Northern Army, and served till his death in 1781.

William Thomson, born in Pennsylvania of Irish parents, probably brother of Charles Thomson, the great secretary of Congress, served gal-lantly at the South, defeated the British at Sullivan's Island, for which he received the thanks of Governor Rutledge, the Irish governor of South Carolina.

John White, a Georgia colonel, son of an Irishman, with two officers and three men, captured a captain and one hundred and seven British regulars; severely wounded when Pulaski fell.

These are but a few of the hundreds of gallant Irish Revolutionary soldiers whose bravery and blood purchased American Independence. I mention in conclusion one more.

ANTHONY WAYNE.

It might have been better had I taken this brave soldier as the only theme and as a fair specimen of Irish-American soldiers in the Revolutheme and as a fair specimen of Irish-American soldiers in the Revolution. As it is, I must only very briefly refer to him. His grandfather lived in Ireland, where his son Isaac, the father of Anthony, was born. In 1722 the family settled in Pennsylvania, where, on the first day of the year 1741, Isaac's only son, Anthony, was born. His Uncle Gilbert was his teacher, and his nephew distracted the brains of two-thirds of the school by his boyish military exploits. At 26 he married into the Penrose family, of Philadelphia. When resistance to England began he mustered a volunteer corps, and in January, 1776, Congress made him a colonel of one of the regiments sent under Major-General Thomas to re-enforce the Northern army.

The was at the affair of Three Rivers, where his Irish fellow-officers, Thompson and Irvine, were taken prisoners. He saved the brigade from capture. In February, 1777, Congress made him a brigadier-general, and on the advance of the British general on Philadelphia and eral, and on the advance of the British general on Finiadeaphia and his subsequent retreat, Washington sent four corps in pursuit, and, what is remarkable, their four commanders were all Irish—Sullivan, Maxwell, Morgan, and Wayne, two native-born and two the sons of Irishmen. These Irish generals drove the British from New Jersey, and were warmly eulogized in Washington's report to Congress. At Brandywine and Germantown he was conspicuous. Of the two columns moving to the latter battle the right was commanded by two Irish generals, Sullivan and Wayne. Wayne drove the enemy two miles and carried his part of the field. His horse was shot under him, and he was wounded.

If others had done as well Germantown would have been our Yorktown. When the reverse came he covered the retreat and saved the army. At Valley Forge he again saved it; this time from starvation by successful foraging. When the British evacuated Philadelphia, Washington sent out his Irish general, Maxwell, to break down the bridges and obstruct the roads. He dispatched another of his Irish generals, Daniel Morgan, with six hundred troops, to assail the enemy's right flank, and he selected Wayne to command the thousand select soldiers to attack the rear of the enemy's army, and when the British turned upon Lee and La Fayette the field was saved by two Irish heroes, Wayne and Ramsay, till Washington had time to reorganize his shattered and re-Ramsay, till Washington had time to reorganize his shattered and retreating troops, and then, after pouring the storm of his rage upon Lee, he turned the storm of his Irish generals on the enemy. Morgan's rifles, Knox's artillery, and Wayne's bayonets, all Irish, under the incomparable Washington, a naturalized Irishman, routed the English forces, and the glory of Monmouth flung back its effulgence on the gloom of Valley Forge. Washington in his official report says: "The catalogue of those who distinguished themselves is too long to admit of particularizing individuals." I can not however, forbear to mention of particularizing individuals. I can not, however, forbear to mention Brigadier-General Wayne." In writing of the battle Wayne himself says that the Pennsylvania (Irish) troops showed the road to victory. His great achievement, however, was at the storming of Stony Point. Washington thought it of the greatest importance that this stronghold of the Hudson should be captured, and of course chose this Irish-American general for the service. It was washed by the Hudson on two sides and covered by a marsh on the third side, which the tide overvan succeeded Lee and effected a junction with Washington. At the battle of Trenton Washington himself took command of one of the two columns and put Sullivan at the head of the other. Victory followed and Princeton succeeded, and Sullivan was there, again conspicuous and brave. In May, 1777, Washington organized his army into five divisions and gave Sullivan the command of one. At Brandywine and Germantown he displayed courage and bravery. At the latter Wash-writer is no more." It was twenty minutes past midnight when, through the morass now overflowed by the tide, over the double row of abatis and the supposed impregnable works on the summit under a of abatis and the supposed impregnable works on the summit under a hot fire of musketry and a shower of shells and grape, the daring assailants rushed upon the enemy, not a ball in their muskets, but with Wayne's favorite weapon, the bayonet. A musket-ball struck Wayne on his head and he fell; but rising on one knee he exclaimed: "March on! Carry me into the fort; I will die at the head of the column." This was the most brilliant affair of the war. General Lee declared it the most brilliant exploit in military history.

After some other noted services, at Fort Lee and elsewhere, he again shone forth at Yorktown. He had hung upon Cornwallis's rear as he retreated to Yorktown, and at one time attacked the main army of the enemy with a mere handful of men, striking such terror into the heart of the British commander that he was afraid to attempt to capture his of the British commander that he was afraid to attempt to capture his pursuers, which he could easily have done. At the investment of Yorktown, Wayne, with Clinton, another Irish general, opened the first parallel on the 6th of October, 1781. On the 11th the second parallel was commenced, and Wayne commanded. On the 14th, after dark, the attack on the two redoubts was made by La Fayette, and his chief support were two battalions of Pennsylvania (Irish) troops under Wayne, and on the 19th Yorktown surrendered, but it was Wayne all over, and on the 19th Torktown sale.

After Yorktown he was ordered South to support Greene. He resolved to the support of Georgia from the enemy. His last service was to any to conquer cued the State of Georgia from the enemy. His last service was to take possession of Charleston at the close of the war, and to conquer the Indians who had baffled Harman and defeated St. Clair. He died in 1796. Such are but a few of the labors and hardships these brave Irishmen endured to make a free home and a refuge for mankind.

All these, and hundreds of others, illustrious heroes in the Revolutionary war were Irishmen or sons of Irishmen—most of them born in Ireland.

OTHER ILLUSTRIOUS IRISHMEN.

I have not time to mention, as I intended, what services were rendered by Irishmen in other walks of life, in Congress, in the pulpit, at the bar, on the bench, in the Navy, as surgeons, as merchants with their money, and in all ways that secured our success.

The great captain, the first commodore of our Navy, John Barry, and Captain Porter, the present Admiral's grandfather, were conspicuous in that grand navy that has given us the records of Barry, Porter, Rodgers, Decatur, Stewart (Parnell's grandfather). Perry, Macdonough, Bleakly, and our present Admiral and Vice-Admiral Porter and Rowan, all Irish. The great men who advocated and declared our Independence, Thornton, Livingston, Smith, Taylor, Ross, Read, McKean, Lynch, Carroll, Rutledge, all signers, and above them all Charles Thom-son, the secretary of Congress, born at Magherd, in the County of Derry, and all Irish.

Derry, and all Irish.

The great Revolutionary governors of the States, Rutledge, of South Carolina; Burke, of North Carolina; Clinton, of New York; Read, of Delaware; Weare, of New Hampshire; Reed, of Pennsylvania; Livingston of New Jersey, and others, all Irish. Rutledge, Clinton, and Livingston, all governors in the heat of the Revolution, and all rendering great, transcendent services to our cause of freedom. Cochran and Ramsay, conspicuous among our surgeons, both Irish. But above all in the pulpit! Who can estimate the power of that pulpit, which gave hundreds of elegent divines, particularly the Presbyterian Irish? I can dreds of eloquent divines, particularly the Presbyterian Irish? I can mention only half a dozen. Rodgers, of New York; McWhorter, of New wark; Caldwell, of Elizabethtown; Duffield, of Philadelphia; Patrick Alison, of Baltimore; Waddell, of Virginia, the celebrated blind preacher, and, grandly in the front of all, the illustrious Catholic archbishop of Baltimore, John Carroll. Thus, in the Army and Navy, in the pulpit and from Congress, America holds up the endless roll of her Irish heroes, and exclaims, "These are my jewels."

And he who can hear the name of Ireland mentioned with dishonor or refuses to join in the chorus of her praise is not a true American. Without Knox, Morgan, Montgomery, Reed, Stark, Sullivan, and Wayne we should have had no independence, and without Ireland we should not have had them.

Much pride I take in my course and in what I secured for American citizenship, yet no member of Congress ever attended more diligently to other public questions and matters of local interest to my constituents. I first introduced into Congress the bill for the public building in Brooklyn, and after fourteen years' absence came back to help it through. It was on my motion that the Brooklyn Bridge bill was carried through Congress in the last hours of the Fortieth Congress, and only for my prompt diligence that bill would have been delayed for two years

In the Gowanus Bay improvement and in all improvements of New York Harbor, from Sandy Hook to Hell Gate, I was quite as prominent as any member from New York or Brooklyn. In the postal reform movement my speeches will not compare unfavorably with others. On American shipping, rivers and harbors, diplomatic matters, French spoliation claims, on needy and worthy claimants for pensions, on the letter-carriers, and other public and private matters I fear not to appeal to my record, and I take especial pride in my speeches and services for the worthy granddaughter of the author of the Declaration of Independence.

Perhaps my speech on diplomacy and decorations, delivered on the 14th of May, 1884, was the thing for which I got the most abuse. The columns of the anglified press fairly boiled over with vituperation. It seemed as if I had broken all the commandments at once and perpetrated other outrages too horrible to mention. I confess I was staggered and I sought advice. As soon as my speech was published I sent a copy of it, marked "personal," to my old friend Charles A. Dana, editor of the New York Daily Sun. It was a formidable octavo pamphlet of forty-eight pages, and I hesitated to ask him to read it through, but I begged of him to look it over at his leisure and tell me the worst; to pick out the worst paragraph he could find and publish it, with his opinion whether it was so horrible as had been represented in the press. In the Sun of July 14, 1884, the following editorial appeared, written by Mr. Dana himself:

INJUSTICE TO MR. ROBINSON.

The somewhat celebrated oration of Hon. WILLIAM E. ROBINSON, of Brooklyn, on diplomacy and decorations was delivered in the House of Representatives two months ago to-day, but it has only recently come to hand in the Congressional Record.

We have read this speech with considerable interest, for Mr. ROBINSON has been roundly abused for his utterances on that occasion, and we desired to see whether he had, in fact, lost all the good sense and bright wit which formerly distinguished many of his intellectual efforts.

We do not think that he has been so unfortunate. There is enough truth and there is enough lively enunciation of sound American doctrine in his remarks on sham diplomacy to make half a dozen good speeches. Whenever he is led into bitterness of sentiment or betrayed into hyperbolic phraseology, it is only because his hatred of humbug is genuine and hearty. The principles which he maintains are in the main correct; his language certainly does not lack vigor. Two years ago Judge Black wrote to Mr. Robinson: "I can not but admire the man who has done as much as you have to make up and sustain the great issue between free government and despoticrule on both sides of the Atlantic." We can not see that Judge Black would have occasion, if he were still alive, to change his opinion of Mr. Robinson's course in Congress.

ANNEXATION OF IRELAND.

Another thing for which I got roundly abused, as if I had lost all Another thing for which I got roundly abused, as If I had lost all common sense, was my joint resolution (House resolution 362, Forty-seventh Congress, second session) offered on the 26th of February, 1883, read twice, and ordered printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It was offered at a time when "society" here was singing the praises of England and abusing Ireland. I introduced it more for the preamble than for the resolution, because that preamble contained more solid and undeniable truth than is generally in order in either House. I reproduce it here:

Joint resolution for the relief of England, the benefit of Ireland, and the glory of the United States.

Joint resolution for the relief of England, the benefit of Ireland, and the glory of the United States.

Whereas there does not exist on the face of the earth to-day such a blot upon civilization as the English Government in Ireland: The people evicted from their ancestral homes and dying on the highways from famine; habeas corpus suspended; trial by jury abolished, and a whole people's lives and liberties left at the mercy of corrupt judges and perjured informers; strangers arrested without cause, and kept in prison without remedy; the people's chosen representatives in prison; newspapers suppressed and editors criminally punished for publishing the truth; foreign bayonets keeping in prison patriotic gentlemen, chosen by the people while so confined as mayors of their cities and representatives of intelligent constituencies in Parliament; red-handed murderers acknowledging their diabolical crimes, to the perpetration of which they were probably instigated by the minions of government, allowed to escape the punishment which they deserve on condition that they swear away the lives of less guilty men, whom they cajoled into their schemes of assassination, and throw emningly concocted suspicions on wholly innocent men; curfew law enacted in one of the most refined capitals of Europe (Dublin), and hundreds of innocent and honorable men arrested on suspicion in attempting to make calls of business or pleasure in seasonable hours; hired detectives, equaling the adult male population of the city, dogging the footsteps of its people; the houses of the alien despots and of their bribed judges, spies, and informers guarded by foreign bayonets to shield them from the wrath of a people reduced to famine and driven to despair and madness by cruelties unparalleled in history, and a subsidized press and perverted machinery of public opinion employed to misrepresent to the world and to libel an oppressed people manfully contending against overpowering adversities for human rights; and

Whereas the people of Ireland are panning long tied the oppressed and oppressor together for mutual injury and destruction; and Whereas it is the duty of civilized nations to protest against organized barbarism, and to terminate, if possible, a system of such shocking cruelty as the English Government in Ireland; and

Whereas Ireland was looked upon and appealed to by the patriots of the Revolution as one with them in the revolt against the English Government; that she furnished more troops to the Revolutionary army and more of its generals and other officers and left more of its gallant blood upon our battle-fields than any State in the Union; that peace should not have been agreed upon without including Ireland within the territory of the new Republic, and she should not have been left to be punished by England in revenge for the aid she rendered us, and to struggle aione for the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence till quenched in the blood of Emmet and Fitzgerald; and

Whereas Ireland is nearer to us and more necessary to our national safety than much of our acquired territory; that we need her for the eastern landings of our ocean ferries and cable anchorages; that her people and ours are sympathetic and congenial; that a vast majority of our people are of Irish extraction, and searcely a family in Ireland that has not already one or more of its members honored in American citizenship; that while Ireland is a burden to England and a blot upon her name, in our Union she would rival New York, and be second to no State in the Union in wealth, intelligence, and culture; and Whereas our country's greatest achievements have been the conquest, purchase, and annexation of the Territories of Louisians, Florida, Texas, and Mexico, all of which would be rivaled if not eclipsed by the restoration of the lost pleiad to the sisterhood of her love: Therefore,

*Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby requested to open communications with the Government of Great Britain to obtain its consent to the restoration of Ireland to the United States, by purchase or otherwise, as in the case of Louisiana, Alaska, and other portions of our territory.

AN EXPLODED BOMB.

That bomb exploded here right in "society," and such consternation was never seen in the British camp since Mad Anthony Wayne took Stony Point.

Now, those who read these preambles and this resolution can judge whether there is anything in them except their truth so terribly alarming. I know they were not popular in circles where the aristocracy were attending "a german" at the British embassy and the fascinating beauties of its attachés were "distributing the favors." But there was a heap of American truth and republican common sense in them. And here lies my great difficulty. The snobs who so largely control the press here do not think that anything American is really refined, and very few of them knew that Ireland had been looked upon by Franklin and other founders of our Republic as one of the revolted

LETTER FROM MR. BANCROFT.

A short time after offering my first resolution I called with my daughter upon Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft to take leave, at the close of the session, when he remarked that he had read my joint resolution and that I had got hold of the old American idea of Ben Franklin.

On my return to Brooklyn, I wrote to Mr. Bancroft on the subject and received in reply the following letter from the illustrious historian, which he dated on Saint Patrick's Day:

My Dear Sir: I have your letter of March 8. You will find in my history, volume 5, page 24 of the so-called centenary edition, and in volume 8, page 53 of my octave edition, a summary account of the plan inviting Ireland to accede to the union, and to save you trouble I inclose to you the pages to which I refer you. As you may like also to have the exact documentary authority, I add a copy of the first article, and the thirteenth of Franklin's plan of confederation and perpetual union. The whole plan of the confederation proposed on the 21st of July, 1775, you will find in Force's American Archives, volume 2 of the fourth series, pages 1887, 1888, and 1899.

It has given me much pleasure to reply to your inquiries.

Yours, truly,

Hon. WILLIAM E. ROBINSON.

IRELAND AN AMERICAN COLONY.

The following is the thirteenth article of Franklin's plan of confederation referred to by Mr. Bancroft:

ABTICLE XIII. Any and every colony from Great Britain upon the continent of North America not at present engaged in our association may, upon application, and joining the said association, be received into the confederation, namely: Ireland, the West India Islands, Quebec, Saint John's, Nova Scotia, Bermudas, East and West Floridas, and shall thereupon be entitled to all the advantages of our union, mutual assistance, and commerce.

I doubt whether any of the snobs who scribble lies about me from this metropolis know very much about our Revolutionary history, further than that their fathers had to leave the country. Let me suggest to them that if they will study my speeches they will acquire more American knowledge than they are ever likely to learn while drinking the Queen's health at the British minister's in champagne imported free of duty and in detriment to our tariff receipts.

SHOULD BE RESTORED.

When I offered this joint resolution I knew as well as I know now that the ignorant would ridicule the proposition; nor did I then nor do that the ignorant would ridicule the proposition; nor did I then nor do I now expect that so much common sense would be appreciated. Yet certain facts remain. Ireland never will submit herself to English rule. There is enemity between them which can never be eradicated. She has been, is now, and will be a burden to England. In every throb of her existence she is republican. She would bloom into a grand existence under our genial sway. The overarching heavens would ring with the music of Ireland's enrollment among the free States of the Union; and the desolations of Connegnara would rejoice under the music of a thouthe desolations of Connemara would rejoice under the music of a thousand looms as Lough Corrib dances to the sea. Ireland wants us for the blessings we would confer and we want her for the eastern terminus of our steam-ferries and the anchorage of our cables. We can never be entirely independent till both ends of the Atlantic cable throb upon American soil. What is Florida, or Alaska, or any other acquisition of territory compared with what Ireland would be to our Union?

Outside of the hostile garrison, including the pay and pension roll and the absentee landlords that keep Ireland in bondage, there is not one honest Irishman that does not loathe English rule and who does not love the United States.

Henry Clay upon one occasion said that Kentucky was the Ireland of America, and that it seemed as if some convulsion of nature had separated Ireland from this country, where she naturally belongs. John Bright once expressed the hope that Ireland might be taken in tow and conveyed nearer to America. Horatio Seymour told Lord Houghton upon one occasion that at the end of the Revolutionary war we ought to have kept Great Britain, including Ireland, for a coaling station. Henry George, at the Saint Patrick's Day dinner in Brooklyn, in 1883, said:

I want to second the motion of Mr. Robinson for the annexation of Ireland. AN OFFER TO MY CRITICS.

After every speech I made there were violent howlings from the pack that have been in full cry upon my footsteps. I have made many speeches on many subjects, of which about a dozen have been republished in pamphlet form, and I challenge my most virulent assailant ished in pamphlet form, and I challenge my most virulent assailant to select from any of them a passage unworthy of myself or of the grand constituency I represent. If my challenge is accepted I shall furnish copies of all my speeches, and shall submit them to an impartial tribunal not of my own party and not of Irish sympathy. I should name any three prominent citizens—say Mayor Seth Low, General Horatio C. King, and Dr. Storrs, or Dr. Talmage, and if they will select any passage from any of my speeches which they will say is worthy of censure I shall acknowledge the truth of all the charges made against

LETTER FROM REV. DR. TALMAGE.

Upon all my speeches and acts here I hold numerous testimonials from literary men, journalists, venerable bishops and clergymen of all

First of all I take this letter, which I have just received from Rev. Dr. T. De Witt Talmage, whose church is in my district:

BROOKLYN, February 23, 1885.

BROOKLYN, February 23, 1885.

Dear Friend: I can not let your Congressional term of office close until I have thanked you for the able manner in which you have represented our city in the councils of the nation. From the time that, in my boyhood, I heard you make the most stirring and electrifying political address I have ever heard until the present time, I have watched your course with ever-increasing interest.

There have been passages in your speeches which are unsurpassed in the annals of American eloquence. With pen as well as voice you have done a service which ought to be an everlasting satisfaction. I have noticed that some of the finest and most graceful things you have said have been derided by those who had no capacity to appreciate them. But that is the lot of mortals.

Well done, good and faithful servant of God and country!

With congratulation and cordial greeting, yours, &c.,

T. DE WITT TALMAGE.

Hon. W. E. ROBINSON.

Where are my slanderers who say that I have not represented the intellectual portion of the Brooklyn people? That letter came so unexpectedly. I had not seen nor written to its distinguished author for months. I take pride in preserving it for the gratification of my chil-

OTHER FRIENDLY TESTIMONIALS.

One of the most venerable and venerated Episcopal bishops in the United States, and not of Irish blood, who had read my speech on our imprisoned American citizens, for which I was so roundly abused, writing to his friend in Washington, says:

Oftentimes have I reverted to those very pleasant days spent with you; and of the many kind attentions of the Hon. Mr. Robenson. Please tell that kind friend that I not only received but read his speech with much pleasure. He does not seem to be much afraid of the British lion or to admire the English minister. I wish that there were in our legislative halls many more such honest and outspoken men.

Another clergyman, and one of the most accomplished doctors of divinity in Brooklyn, after reading the same much-abused speech, says: I sincerely congratulate you on an effort which might well crown a lifetime of study. It has made you hosts of admirers throughout the length and breadth of the land and has made your constituents proud of you.

A gentleman connected with the Government here, not prejudiced by party or race in my favor, whose residence is in Brooklyn, writes:

As a constituent who has with silent interest followed your course in the House of Representatives, and heartily indorsed all public measures originated and supported by you, I deem this the proper time to express to you my sincere regret that your retirement will remove from Congress one of the nation's best counselors. The country can ill spare any of her broad, honest, fearless, and faithful servants, especially at a time which is pregnant with important issues.

I have before me hundreds of letters, which those so desiring can see, like these, from all professions and all denominations, which I shall not further refer to and should not have quoted only to counteract the idea so sedulously circulated in a prejudiced press that my conduct in Congress has not been laudable.

FANNY PARNELL.

A single sentence, however, from one of the many letters I have from the late Miss Fanny Parnell I must give:

I have read with the greatest interest your speech, in which you surpass yourself. I always read every line of all your speeches, for where should we be without the consistent and eloquent advocacy you have always given our cause?
It does you, I think, the highest honor that the newspapers to which you allude should be hostile to you. We can tell what a man is just as well by the nature of his enemies as by the nature of his friends. Hoping you will continue with steady success your career as Ireland's advocate in America,
I remain, yours, very truly,

OTHER LETTERS.

There are many letters in my possession, running back for nearly fifty years, from distinguished men, bearing testimony to the importance of my labors in the cause of truth and true republicanism, from which I my labors in the cause of truth and true republicanism, from which is might quote largely similar complimentary tributes to myself. Among them are numerous letters from Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, Archbishop Hughes, Thurlow Weed, Ogden Hoffman, Horace Greeley, George Washington Parke Custis, Washington Hunt, William H. Seward, James T. Brady, Judge George W. Woodward, Jeremiah S. Black, General James Shields, General Thomas Francis Meagher, and other illustricated in the complex control of the control of the control of the complex control of the control ous men, on subjects of public interest, in which my name is kindly and favorably mentioned. But I have neither time nor room now. At some future time, if life and health permit, I may publish them in a volume, which, aside from all personal matter, will be interesting to the public.

And now to conclude.

LOOKING BACK.

It is now within one year of half a century since, after a long voyage I arrived in this my adopted, country. I was alone in a strange land, without friends or means of support. What money my venerated father could spare me on leaving home had been spent on the way, and on landing I changed my last sovereign for American coin, and soon after, on declaring my intention to become an American citizen, foreswore on declaring my intention to become an American citizen, foreswore all allegiance to all kings, princes, and potentates whatsoever, and have ever since religiously kept my oath. The education I had received in Ireland enabled me, after brief reviewing and within a year, to enter Yale College. How I got through that venerable university is now to me a marvel and a mystery. My early inclinations to journalism enabled me to earn something in contributing to the editorial columns of the New Haven Daily Herald, while the venerable Thomas G. Woodward, its editor, took post-prandial naps in the editorial chair.

But even with this and other efforts I ran deeply in debt, some of which I paid off with interest when that increment exceeded the principal. My buoyant Irish temperament, and my tendency to oversleen.

cipal. My buoyant Irish temperament, and my tendency to oversleep the hour of morning prayer, threatened me frequently with college discipline. Some of my fellow-students who afterward became judges and ministers were so full of mischief that they could not keep it to themselves, the knowledge of which involved me in punishment which I did not deserve, except in refusing to betray. The sainted president of that institution, Jeremiah Day, and the illustrious Professor Silliman the elder, father of Professor Silliman recently deceased, often kindly excused my eccentricities, while others of the faculty were inexprable, and in due time I received my diplomas in regular form, and orable, and in due time I received my diplomas in regular form, and have ever since met a cordial welcome at alumni meetings and commencements. As years accumulate and age creeps upon me I feel every year an increasing desire to rest for a while my weary frame in the cool shade of the majestic elms that weave their groined arches over the college campus. My venerable teachers have almost all departied, and my younger companions are sinking on the downward slope of life, crowned with liberal honors in the public service of the Republic.

Of those whose acquaintance I made in New Haven I recall the venerable forms of Trumbull, the painter, Webster, the lexicographer, and Percival, the poet. Among my fellow-students were Chief-Justice Waite and Senator Evarts.

While in college I founded the Yale Banner and the Beta of Psi Upsion, and on leaving was chosen valedictorian of my class before the literary society of "Brothers in Unity," of which I was also for a term president. There, too, I made the acquaintance of Horace Greeley, which ripened into friendship unbroken till his death. Soon after leaving college I became his assistant editor and Washington correspondent in the first half of the present century, and made myself a name of some importance. I was admitted to the friendship and enjoyed the hospitality of Henry Clay and Daniel Webster, of John C. Calhoun and John Quincy Adams and their illustrious contemporaries. That friendship I never lost and never forfeited which on my part has triumphed over death.

FORTY-TWO YEARS.

Forty-two years ago I took my seat in this House as a journalist, and am now the oldest Congressional character in Washington. When I took my seat the father of this House [Mr. Kelley, of Pennsylvania] had been but just admitted to the bar, and for seventeen years afterward was not thought of for Congress till his controversy with the then youthful George Northrop.

THE TWENTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS.

It was the Twenty-eighth Congress in which I first took my seat. Among the Senators in that Congress were Richard H. Bayard (uncle of the present Senator), John J. Crittenden, Rufus Choate, Thomas H. Benton, Levi Woodbury, and James Buchanan; Calhoun, Webster, and Clay were not Senators in that Congress.

From my seat in this House in the old Hall, on the right of the Speaker, I daily looked down upon the venerable John Quincy Adams

(the chair in which he sat is now in my possession in Brooklyn), and around him on the western side of the main entrance was Joshua R. around him on the western side of the main entrance was Joshua R. Giddings, Dixon H. Lewis, Stephen A. Douglas, Robert C. Winthrop, Hamilton Fish, John P. Kennedy (Horseshoe Robinson), George P. Marsh, Alexander Ramsey, Thomas L. Clingman, and Alexander H. Stephens. On the eastern side were Robert Dale Owen, John P. Hale, Howell Cobb, John Slidell, Hannibal Hamlin, and Andrew Johnson. Wisconsin, Iowa, and Florida were Territories, the last named represented by David L. Yulee, now of Washington. With all these Senators and Representatives I was personally acquainted. All but six have crossed the dark river whose waters murmur through the vale before me.

From these and other great Gamaliels, at whose feet I sat for many years, I learned my Americanism, and I know that it is genuine—Webster, Clay, and Calhoun; John Quincy Adams, Seward, and Greeley; Cass, Crittenden, and Clayton; Silas Wright, Marcy, and Dickinson; Douglas, Lincoln, and Benton. These for thirty years were my friends and advisers. Oh! si sic omnes! Would that all around me in this House and in yonder Senate inherited the principles of those to whose seats they have succeeded! Give me back the fading glory of former SHALL I RETURN?

Sir, is it any wonder that I should feel sad in addressing the House to-day, perhaps for the last time? I presume I can come back again, for I feel that a vast majority of the voters in my district regret that I am not again returned as their Representative. I was not defeated by the people. Had I been renominated I should have received the largest majority ever given to any Representative from Brooklyn. Indeed I was strongly urged to run without a nomination from either party, with assurances that I would be elected over both candidates. Had I done so many votes would have been lost to the party to which I belonged, and they were not chargeable with my defeat, and so I refrained. Still I may never return again. At my age the future is uncertain. I submit quietly to my fate, whatever it may be. I confess that I desired to come back again and my constituents so desired.

For useful work here I am now more competent than I ever was before, and if death claims me within the next two years I should have preferred to die in harness here. I return to my quiet home and my loving children and my still faithful constituency. I have fought the good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith.

TRUE TO AMERICAN IDEAS.

I have tried to be true to American interests and to oppose all encroachments of foreign feeling and foreign fashions. Twice on the Holy Evangelists I forswore all foreign allegiance and vowed fidelity to the Stars and Stripes. Why did you make me swear against all foreign despots if you did not expect me to keep my oath? Before I touched your shores I was a republican, and soon, very soon, after landing I declared my intention of citizenship. I had heard of Washington and Jefferson and free America in songs and stories over my cradle.

I was born in that glorious era when the red flag of England went down beneath the starry banner in many a battle by sea and land, under American generals and commodores whose relatives were my father's neighbors. I had read of the majestic scenery of this great country, and I had grown up to love every famous name that lighted the page of American history; and when on that September afternoon in 1836 I floated into the harbor of New York and saw the American flag floating from mast and fortress I felt inspired. The fingers of early frost were denyling the foliage on either side in growns class. The frost were dappling the foliage on either side in gorgeous colors. The wavelets broke into music on either shore, while far away the masts and spires of New York pierced the clouds, and up the majestic Hudson imagination quickly traveled to cataract and prairie; and under that inspiration I tried to express the feelings which filled my heart then, warm it now, and will throb in its emotions till death stills its pulsa-

Hail, brightest banner that floats on the gale! Flag of the country of Washington, hail! - Red are thy stripes as the blood of the brave, Bright are thy stars as the sun on the wave! Wrapt in thy folds are the hopes of the free—Banner of Washington! blessings on thee!

Mountain-tops mingle the sky with their snow; Prairies lie smiling in sunshine below; Rivers as broad as the sea in their pride Border thine empires but do not divide; Niagara's voice far out-anthems the sea— Land of sublimity! blessings on thee!

Hope of the world! on thy mission sublime When thou didst burst on the pathway of time Millions from darkness and bondage awoke! Music was born when Liberty spoke! Millions to come yet shall join in the glee— Land of the pilgrim's hope! blessings on thee!

Empires shall perish and monarchies fail, Kingdoms and thrones in thy glory grow pale; Thou shalt live on, and thy people shall own Loyalty's sweet where each heart is thy throne! Union and freedom thine heritage be, Country of Washington! blessings on thee!

Public Buildings-The Evils of the Present System and the Remedy.

SPEECH

HON. STROTHER M. STOCKSLAGER,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 3, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 7523) defining the duties of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, and for other purposes.

EARLY HISTORY OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: There are now some two hundred public buildings belonging to the United States outside the District of Columbia, the greater number of which have been erected since 1865. The first law passed for the erection of public buildings is in section 3 of the act of July 16, 1790, "providing for the establishment of the temporary and permanent seat of the Government of the United States." It provides (Statutes at Large, volume 1, page 130):

* * * According to such plans as the President shall approve, the said commissioners, or any two of them, shall, prior to the first Monday in December, in the year 1800, provide suitable buildings for the accommodation of Congress, and of the President, and for the officers of the Government of the United States.

Under this law the Executive Mansion was erected and the Capitol begun, but there is no record showing how much was expended upon the public buildings of the District of Columbia prior to 1803.

The next reference in the laws to public buildings is in section 3 of the act of February 25, 1799, "respecting quarantines and health laws," which provided-

That there shall be purchased or erected, under the orders of the President of the United States, suitable warehouses, with wharves and inclosures, where goods and merchandise may be unladen and deposited from any vessel which may be subject to a quarantine or other restraint, pursuant to the held laws of any State as aforesaid, at such place or piaces therein as the safety of the public revenue and the observance of such health laws may require.

The first appropriation to carry this act into effect was May 1, 1802, when there was appropriated $69,026.12. March 14, 1804, there was appropriated $5,000, and March 1, 1805, $15,533.21. Of these sums $73,654.18 was expended, as follows:

1802. Joshua Sands, for erecting storehouse and wharf on Staten Island, $15,070.85.

1804. David Gelston, New York, agent for purchase or erection of wharves and stores, $4,353.15.

1802. James Simmons, purchase of a house and lot on Sullivan's Island and erecting a wharf at Point Comfort, $8,220.18.

1802. Lazaretto, Philadelphia, $29,238.33. 1804-'06. Lazaretto, Baltimore, $15,161.27.

1804-'06. Lazaretto, Baltimore, $15,161.27.

The first custom-house erected was at New Orleans, under appropriation of $20,000, February 13, 1807, of which sum $19,200 was used. It was built under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

April 30, 1816, Congress appropriated $250,000, to be applied by the Secretary of the Treasury, under the direction of the President, in the hire, purchase, or building of custom-houses, warehouses, and stores in such manner as he shall deem most expedient.

March 3, 1817, $50,000 more was appropriated for purchasing or

March 3, 1817, $50,000 more was appropriated for purchasing or erecting, for the use of the United States, suitable buildings for customhouses or public warehouses, in such principal district in each State where the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem it necessary for the safe and convenient collection of the revenue of the United States. 9, 1818, $200,000 was appropriated, and March 3, 1819, $100,000. Of these sums $87,493.37 was returned to the Treasury. The remainder 9, 1818, $200,000 was appropriated, and March 3, 1819, $100,000. Of these sums $87,493.37 was returned to the Treasury. The remainder was expended on custom-houses at Alexandria, Va.; Baltimore, Md.; Boston, Mass.; Charleston, S. C.; New Haven, Conn.; New Orleans, La.; New York, N. Y.; Norfolk, Va.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Portsmouth, N. H.; Providence, R. I.; Salem, Mass.; Savannah, Ga.; Wilmington, N. C. There were comparatively few public buildings erected during the first half of this century. At the close of the year 1849 there were only forty-one public buildings in the country outside the District of Columbia. Twenty-seven of these were custom-houses and fourteen.

only forty-one public buildings in the country outside the District of Columbia. Twenty-seven of these were custom-houses and fourteen marine hospitals. Twenty-eight of these were purchased, twelve built, and one, at Monterey, Cal., obtained by conquest. The system by which these were built was very imperfect, and when Hon. James Guthrie became Secretary of the Treasury, in 1853, he reorganized it. In his first annual report, December 6, 1853, he thus referred to the

The construction of these buildings is confided to the Department, and almost everything but the amount of the appropriation left to the discretion of the Secretary. No system had been devised for the due performance of this duy, nor had the management of the business been confided to any particular branch of the Department. An architect had been employed in the Department at a salary of $3,000 per annum, with traveling expenses allowed when absent inspecting the works, &c. He was paid out of the several appropriations, according to the time given to each work. Local architects and superintendents had also been appointed, and were paid out of the appropriations, but there was no system of keeping or rendering accounts at the respective works, nor of keeping the same in the Department.

With a view to a more efficient management application was made to the Secretary of War for a scientific and practical engineer to be placed in charge of the construction of these buildings, and Capt. Alexander H. Bowman, of the Engineer Corps, was detailed and assigned to that duty. General regulations for the conduct of the business have been adopted and sent to those in charge of the respective works, and a department of construction organized for the supervision of the whole. * * * The architect has also been retained to aid the Department in his particular line.

This organization continued until 1862, the only change being that

This organization continued until 1862, the only change being that S. M. Clark succeeded Captain Bowman as engineer in charge in 1859-'60. He continued in charge until 1862. July 28, 1862, Isaiah Rogers was appointed to the head of the Department as Supervising Architect. He states that he was unable to make a report in 1862 "for the reason that the records of this office were so imperfect and confused that it was utterly impossible for me to procure the necessary information in time."

A reorganization was effected, and it has continued with little change until the present time.

It seems that the expenses of the office were paid out of the expenditures for public buildings, a certain portion being charged to the appropriation for each building. In the appropriation act of March, 1864, the following clause was inserted in section 6, providing for increased clerical force in the Departments:

In the construction branch of the Treasury, one superintending-"Superintending," evidently a slip of the penarchitect, one assistant architect, two clerks of class 4, four of class 3, two of class 1, and one messenger at an annual salary of $500.

Appropriations were made in pursuance of this law, except that "superintending," before "architect," was changed to "supervising" in the act of March 4, 1865, until the act of July 20, 1868, when, after making the appropriations for the "construction branch of the Treasury," the law says:

And the clause in act of March 14, 1864, providing for the officers, clerks, and messengers in the construction branch of the Treasury Department, is hereby continued in force until July 1, 1869, and no longer.

The only effect of this repeal seems to have been that of causing a larger appropriation to be made the next year. Since that time there have been but slight changes in the organization of the Supervising Architect's Office.

THE POLICY OF ERECTING PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The policy of erecting public buildings where they are needed for the transaction of Government business has been so long established and has been so uniformly practiced under every administration for fifty years that it may be assumed to have become a settled policy of the Government. The amount of money disbursed on account of the purchase or erection of public buildings outside of the District of Columbia from the foundation of the Government until the year 1850 was $3,931,-974.68, and this sum was increased at the end of the fiscal year 1861 to $21,871,139.72. Unfortunately similar data can not be obtained for the following years, except with so great labor that it was impossible to have it completed in time to incorporate it here. But though there was a falling off in the amount appropriated during the years of the war, there has been a large increase in the appropriations for public buildings since that time. For the fiscal year ending 1871 there was appropriated over four million dollars for the erection of public buildings. ings, and in 1880, for the fiscal year ending 1881, over four and a half millions.

It will thus be seen that for the first sixty years of the Republic, or from 1790 to 1850, the average annual expenditure for public buildings was but $65,535.82. But from 1850 to 1860 the average annual expenditure was $1,793,016.50. In 1870 $4,000,000, and in 1880 $4,-500,000. The growth of this policy of the Government, though slow, especially prior to 1850, was steady, and since that time has been more rapid, and continued steadily through all the administrations and by all political parties.

It may be confidently assumed, therefore, that whatever individual members of this House may say, and whatever tactics they may adopt to prevent the majority of the members of this body from considering bills for the erection of public buildings, that policy will not be abandoned, but will continue to grow as the country grows, and the convenient and economical transaction of the growing and ever-increasing business of the Government shall require.

In the appendix will be found a statement showing amount of money expended for public buildings outside of the District of Columbia, by expended for public buildings outside of the District of Columbia, by States, to the present time. This list was prepared with great labor by Mr. H. M. Beadle, clerk to House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and is accurate.

NEED OF REORGANIZATION.

That there is need of a reorganization of the construction branch of the Treasury Department there can be no question. A department that spent over four million dollars in 1883, and three and a quarter million in 1884, should not only be organized by law, but have its powers, duties, and responsibilities well defined. This has never been done.

Secretary Guthrie put this branch of the Treasury in a much better shape than it had ever been before; but it was only by rule of the Treasury Department and not by law that it was done. Practically now, as Secretary Guthrie reported in 1853, "the construction of these buildings is confided to the Department, and almost everything but the amount of the appropriation left to the discretion of the Secretary."

Captain Bowman, the engineer in charge of these works, repeatedly recommended that the construction department of the Treasury be better organized, and that a system of erecting the public buildings be devised which would secure the speedy completion of the buildings, and thus prevent the waste and unnecessary expense which followed appropriations doled out in dribbles and want of a properly organized force to carry into effect the wishes of Congress. In his report of September 30, 1857, he says:

The duty of erecting these buildings devolves upon the Secretary of the Treasury, but he has no voice in designating the points at which they shall be located. No provision is made by law to enable him to discharge the duties assigned him in the construction of these buildings. The present bureau or office of construction, to which, under the Secretary of the Treasury, this duty is assigned exists, from necessity, without special authority of law. The large amounts appropriated annually for the erection of public buildings require, if the system is to be continued, a permanent organization of the office charged with the expenditures of the money so appropriated.

The change which was made in 1862, which put the control of this branch of the office under an architect instead of an engineer of the Army, was made by order of the Secretary, as the appointment of an "engineer in charge" was by the order of a former Secretary. It was not recognized by law until 1864, when certain offices were created for the "construction branch of the Treasury;" but there has never been any law defining the duties of the officers and employés of that "branch" of the

One result of this lack of regulation by law is that numerous complaints have been made against this branch of the Treasury, and several investigations have been made by Congress and by the Treasury Department. The limits of cost of the buildings fixed by law was in many instances greatly exceeded. In fact, the Supervising Architect, in his report of October 31, 1868, said:

In the preparation of designs I have not considered myself limited by the amount of the appropriation made, except in cases where the cost was specially restricted to the amount, but have prepared designs for buildings large enough to accommodate the offices for whose use the building was intended, and not more costly than the importance of the locality and the dignity of the Government demanded.

There is now no check upon the Supervising Architect except the vigilance of the Secretary of the Treasury. His duties are largely technical, and such that the Secretary must rely upon him in almost everything pertaining to his office. A headstrong, rash Supervising Architect, not to say a corrupt one, may put the country to great expense. It is easy to cite cases in point. Let us take the New York post-office building as an illustration. Congress, by resolution of January 22, 1867, appointed a commission to purchase part of the City Hall Park of New York city for $500,000, and "to procure plans and estimates for a suitable building upon said site, to be submitted to the Postmaster-General and Secretary of the Interior, and should such plans and estimates meet their approval they shall communicate the same, with such additional and secretary of the Interior, and should such plans and estimates meet their approval they shall communicate the same, with such additional suggestions as they may think proper, to Congress." The above named officers approved of said report, and transmitted it to Congress February 25, 1868. The history of this we quote from the report of the Commit-tee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House (Report No. 58), sec-ond session of the Forty-first Congress, submitted April 14, 1870:

tee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House (Report No. 58), second session of the Forty-first Congress, submitted April 14, 1870:

The report of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads in the Fortieth Congress formally approved of the plans of the commission and of the erection of a building in accordance therewith.

The architects who prepared the plans made careful estimates of the cost of the building, which amounted to, including a liberal allowance for contingencies, the sum of $8,542,930. Your committee examined these architects under oath, and they all reaffirmed the correctness of their plans and estimates. This plan proposed to utilize, by inclosing within the walls of the building all the ground embraced in the purchase. These plans were criticised and objected to by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, chiefly, among other things, on account of the alleged extravagant cost of such a building, and also on the ground that the use of 55-feet girders, clear span, above the drive-way, "to support the floors and partitions," were a violation of sound principles of construction.

His estimates, however, did not materially differ from those of the New York architects for a building after their plan, but he claimed that a building of either granite or marble, of the same size and general style and plan, dispensing with what he thought was unnecessary iron work, could be constructed for much less. His estimate for a building according to the plans of the Congressional commission was $3,425,878.46. His estimate of a marble building, "first class," "equal capacity," &c., $2,495,212.22. And for a "granite building," first class," "equal capacity," &c., $2,495,212.22. And for a "granite building," first class," "equal capacity," and similar design, was only $2,156,555.06. During the last session of the Fortieth Congress, without other legislation providing for the erection of such a building, an amendment was made to an appropriation bill appropriating $200,000 to commence the construction of working plans of the basement or foundation) for a building embracing some 10,000 square feet less area than the one projected by the New York architects, and has furnished the committee with estimates showing that the building he is erecting will cost $3,864,088.85, being $1,707,533.77 more than his estimate of March, 1808, for a larger building. The Supervising Architect alleges that his estimate of March, 1868 (of $2,156,555.06), was made upon false quantities furnished him by his computer, as he believes intentionally, which, however, is denied by the computer, who verifies the computation and estimate he then made.

This building cost the Government in the end $9,311,690.67.

The post-office and subtreasury at Boston, Mass., is another example of the way laws have been evaded by the Supervising Architect. Congress provided for the erection of a post-office and subtreasury at Boston, and on April 13, 1870, enacted the following:

and on April 13, 1870, enacted the following:

For continuing the work on the building for post-office and subtreasury in Boston, Mass., $500,000: Provided. That no part of this sum beyond the sum of $250,000, or any other sum appropriated for this purpose, shall be expended until a contract or contracts for the completion of the entire building, in conformity with plans to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and Post-master-General, and at all times under their direction, shall be entered into with the lowest responsible bidder or bidders, and for a sum not exceeding $1,500,000, including all sums expended for that purpose, except that for the site; and the expenditure of any sum of money in violation of this proviso shall be deemed unlawful.

This limit was most forcibly affirmed in two subsequent acts, namely, that of July 15, 1870, and that of March 3, 1871. Notwithstanding this limit of $1,500,000 was so positively fixed by law, and the expenditure of the money made conditional on a contract or contracts for the completion of the building for that sum, plans and specifications were made for a much more costly building; and there was actually expended upon this building, over and above the cost of the site ($1,-320,005,84), up to Sentember 20, 1893, 42, 202,691,10, and there was 329,095.84), up to September 30, 1883, $4,303,681.19, and there remained in the Treasury at that time $196,518.03 to be expended upon it, and $50,000 more were appropriated July 7, 1884, for its completion, besides $30,000 for furniture, which was appropriated May 1, 1884. This has been done under the present laws controlling the expenditure This has been done under the present laws controlling the expenditure of money for public buildings, and it may be done again, showing the necessity of further legislation upon the subject to prevent Congress being overreached by this department.

But perhaps a still more striking illustration of this vicious system, as well as the deception practiced upon the people through Congressional legislation, may be found in the case of the Philadelphia public

The limit of cost of the building was fixed by the original act, June 8, 1872 (Statutes at Large, volume 17, page 342), at $1,500,000. By act of March 3, 1873, the limit was extended to $3,000,000 (volume 17, page 523). The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], on the 20th of February, 1873, in a speech in this House, approved of that extension of limit and supported the bill, but he added that he would oppose any further extension. (Globe, third session Forty-second Congress volume 92 pages 1548)

The next year, however, on the 23d day of June, 1874 (volume 18, page 228), the limit of the cost of this building was again extended to $4,000,000, and, although the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was a member of that House at the time, I have been unable to find when he control the pennsylvania and the pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was a member of that House at the time, I have been unable to DALL] was a member of that House at the time, I have been unable to find where he opened his mouth against that extension, although he had pledged himself to do so.

But the most astounding statement is yet to follow.

Notwithstanding this limit of $4,000,000, which was fully twice what it should have been, there has been expended on that building to this date $5,716,000, or $1,716,000 beyond this limit, every dollar of it, too, while the gentleman was Speaker of this House or a member of the Committee on Appropriations. Comment is unnecessary. I merely state the facts and defy contradiction. An impartial country will understand, and not fail to appreciate, how disinterested and how honest such individuals are when they cry combination against others, and filibuster against the consideration by the House of bills for public buildings, each standing upon its own merits, and to be fully considbuildings, each standing upon its own merits, and to be fully considered and amended if the House desired to do so.

NECESSITY FOR STRICT LEGISLATION.

That there is a necessity for binding down the construction department of the Treasury so that the work on public buildings shall be done by contract, with every possible guard against any violation of the law, is shown by a history of what is called the

"FIFTEEN PER CENT. CONTRACTS."

The first we hear of these contracts was in 1862, when it was discovered by an investigation made by the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings of the House of Representatives. That committee in its report of July 10, 1862, cites the terms of a contract as follows:

For all carving or ornamental work such additional sums shall be paid as the superintending architect, or the duly authorized agent of the first part (the Secretary of the Treasury), shall ascertain to be its fair cost, increased by 15 per cent.

Under this contract the cost of much of the work on the Charleston (S. C.) custom-house and the Treasury building in this city was increased fivefold. A scandal followed, and the office of "engineer in charge" was abolished and the business put in charge of a supervising architect. C. P. Dixon seems to have had an interest in these contracts.

On the 1st of September, 1869, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, without proper advertisement, entered into a contract with this same C. P. Dixon as treasurer of the Dix Island Granite Company, of Maine. By the terms of this contract the Dix Island Granite Company was to furnish all the granite for the New York post-office building, and the Government was to pay in addition to a fixed price for the stone in the rough "the full expense and cost of such working descriptions." the Government was to pay in addition to a fixed price for the stone in the rough "the full expense and cost of such working, dressing, insuring, and boxing of said stone as may be required by the party of the first part (the United States) to be done at said quarry, increased by 15 per cent. thereof." The report of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House, submitted April 14, 1870, contained the following comment on this contract:

Unless the expenditures for these purposes, shall more carefully be scrutin-ized than usual, by competent and honest agents of the Treasury Department, it will be seen that a great facility would be offered to the Dix Island Company to augment the amount of such expenditures.

Similar contracts were made with the Old Dominion Granite Company, of Virginia; the Hurricane, the Bodwell and Clark's Island Granite Companies, of Maine, and the Cape Ann Granite Company, of Massa-chusetts; and the evils pointed out by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads were such as any thoughtful person might have fore-seen—the cost of the work on all the buildings where this stone was seen—the cost of the work on all the buildings where this stone was furnished under these contracts was greatly increased.

The Dix Island Granite Company made a contract by which it was agreed that if they were ordered to employ at any one time more than one hundred granite-cutters they would erect for the Government suitable boarding-houses, storehouses, sheds, shops, stables, &c., and furnish steel for tools, and they were to receive from the Government 15 per cent. on the gross cost of all these buildings, tools, &c. In pursuance of this agreement the Government did order that some seven hundred extra stone-cutters should be employed, and buildings, shops, sheds, tools, &c., were furnished, costing a very large sum ($180,000), which was paid by the Government, with 15 per cent. additional.

When the contract on the New York building was completed, these buildings, shops, tools, &c., were ordered to be sold, and the sale was advertised; but somehow there was no bidder other than the Dix Island Granite Company, who bid them all in for less than $2,000. Shortly

Granite Company, who bid them all in for less than $2,000. Shortly after another contract was made by this company to furnish stone for the Philadelphia post-office building, and these buildings, sheds, shops, tools, &c., were resold to the Government for a sum almost equal to their first cost.

To be more exact: The tools, buildings, furniture, &c., above referred to was appraised at $102,779.98. They were all sold to that company on the 1st day of December, 1873, for $1,461.35. The purchase-money was paid on the 24th day of August, 1874. They were purchased back again by the Government on the 24th day of April, 1875, at the sum at which they were appraised when sold by the Government, to wit, $102,779.98. The account would stand thus:

15 per cent. on original cost	$27,000	00
Profit on purchase$102, 779 98, less $1, 461 35=	=101, 318	63
15 per cent. on purchase from themselves	15, 416	99

143, 735 62 Or a clear profit of ...

in two years upon an investment of $1,461.35.

The amounts furnished for the New York post-office are as follows, as per statement of September 2, 1869:

Shops and sheds	$49,030 73
Labor	2, 682, 035 26
Material	137, 008 57

	2,86	3,074	56
15 per cent.	43	0, 200	00
Philadelphia building, 15 per cent.	. 10	3,010	47

These contracts were evidently not viewed with favor in the Supervising Architect's office, for Mr. Potter, in his report for 1875, says of them:

Ing Architect's office, for Mr. Potter, in his report for 1870, says of them:

Upon my entry into this office there were in process of execution contracts for cutting granite for the superstructures of several of the largest buildings now being constructed under the supervision of the Treasury Department. These contracts, known as the percentage contracts, provide for the payment to the contractors of the actual cost of all labor and materials used in the work of cutting, dressing, and boxing the stone, increased by 15 per cent. of the same. While there are advantages in this system of executing this very important branch of the service, I am persuaded that it is founded in a mistaken principle, and that, as long as the profits to the contractors are in proportion to the extent of the expenses of their work, the Department will find great difficulty in keeping the cost of the same within reasonable limits.

In January, 1877, the contract with the Old Dominion Granite Company was modified with the consent of the contractors, who were to receive a fixed price per cubic foot for stone in the rough and also a fixed price per cubic foot for working, dressing, and boxing the same. Secretary Sherman's attention was called to these contracts in 1877.

The Attorney-General examined them at the former's request, and gave it as his opinion that the contracts might be canceled or modified. On the receipt of this opinion Secretary Sherman appointed Assistant Secretary French, Col. T. L. Casey, and Supervising Architect James G. Hill a commission to examine the contracts, and report "whenever in their opinion a legal contract could be made with the contractors for the completion of the work to prepare a form of such agreement to be submitted to the proper department for approval." This commission, strange to say, made no written report; but under their direction and with the consent of the contractors the other 15 per cent. contracts were modified as those of the Old Dominion Granite Company's contracts had been modified.

The committee, consisting of Hon. John C. New, Mr. D. S. Alexander, and Mr. W. F. MacLennan, appointed by Secretary Folger in 1883 to investigate the charges presented by Hon. Thomas H. Murch against Mr. James G. Hill, Supervising Architect, heard some evidence and made a report particularly upon the modification of these contracts. They avoided making any extended report, as the matter only came before them incidentally; but they said enough to show how these contracts trammeled the action of the officers of the Government, who evidently felt they were unfair and unjust to the Government, yet a delicate matter to get rid of. This committee says:

yet a delicate matter to get rid of. This committee says:

It is not claimed by the Supervising Architect that the prices under the modified contracts are as low as might have been obtained had the commission appointed by Secretary Sherman deemed it advisable to cancel instead of modify the existing 15 per cent. contracts, thus permitting them to readvertise for new proposals. But for reasons satisfactory to them and approved by Secretary Sherman, it was decided to be in the interests of economy to modify these contracts. * * Upon the question whether it was in the interest of the Government to modify rather than to cancel these contracts your committee does not feel called upon to pass. We were not appointed to investigate that subject. Your committee find that the prices agreed upon were largely in excess of the then ruling market rates, and had the contracts been canceled and new ones made by advertising for proposals the Government would undoubtedly have secured these lower rates. But very important legal and prudential as well as economical considerations entered into the settlement of that question, which appear to have been weighed with great care and deliberation by the commission, whose work was subsequently approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. Hill, in his report for 1877, in giving an account of the modifi-cation of these contracts, says the terms were not as favorable as the cation of these contracts, says the terms were not as favorable as the Government might have had by making new contracts, but that under the circumstances it was thought best to modify them. The Secretary of the Treasury evidently feared the courts might not take the same view of the contracts that the Attorney-General had taken, and that there might be a heavy suit before the Court of Claims over the matter if the contracts were canceled.

I think it is unnecessary to proceed with this part of the subject further; and I submit that a system under which such a great abuse could grow, in the face of the investigation and report of Mr. Farnsworth, ought not to continue another day.

MODIFICATION OF THE FIFTEEN PER CENT. CONTRACTS

I wish to refer here to the result which followed a modification of these contracts. The modification consisted, in substance, in paying what had been rated as the cost of the work for cutting the stone. For what had been rated as the cost of the work for cutting the stone. For instance, if the cutting of a stone under the 15 per cent. contracts was $1,200, the cost to the Government would be $1,380. Under the modified contract the cost of the same stone would be $1,200—a saving of $180 to the Government. But the contractor, instead of paying the workman $1,200 by day's work, at $4.50 per day, to cut the stone, paid him only $2.50 per day, and compelled him to cut it in one-third the time he had been given under the old contract, or gave him $400 for cutting the stone by the piece. The result was that the Government saved $180, the contractor made $800 instead of $180, and the workman lost what the contractor gained. lost what the contractor gained.

FAVORITISM.

There had also grown up in the Supervising Architect's Office a favoritism that was far from being conducive to the interests of the Govvoritism that was far from being conducive to the interests of the Government. The law regarding advertising for proposals for materials for Government use was either violated or evaded by sharp practices, and the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury seems to have been insufficient to prevent abuses, which grow little by little, but which are none the less hurtful to good government. It is the tendency in the Executive Departments, greater now perhaps than in the years following the war, to exercise a discretion which the law does not give them, making it a rule to go the extreme verge of the law, instead of keeping elegals within its provisions so that no one could charge them with a respective production. clearly within its provisions, so that no one could charge them with exceeding the powers and duties assigned to them. And in this office the ceeding the powers and duties assigned to them. And in this office the disposition to exceed its powers seems to have been marked from the very beginning. The committee appointed by Secretary Folger to investigate Mr. Hill reports many facts which go to show how the head of this branch of the Treasury Department violated, evaded, or exceeded the law. Even his predecessor, Mr. Potter, permitted the pressure to complete the New York post-office building to cause him to violate the law, so that in completing that building he had work done costing some $200,000 in excess of the appropriations.

$200,000 in excess of the appropriations.

The committee just referred to, appointed by Secretary Folger, in its report has this to say of the responsibilities of the Supervising Architect and the business which is necessarily left to his charge:

tect and the business which is necessarily left to his charge:

As the investigation progressed, your committee was impressed with the belief that the business of the Supervising Architect's Office has outgrown the system under which it is conducted. At the time of the organization of the office, in 1853, under Hon. James Guthrie, then Secretary of the Treasury, and perhaps for many years after, this system may have been sufficient for the purpose intended. But the business of the office has grown with the country, until the disbursements for a single year almost equal the aggregate amount expended outside the city of Washington for the first fifty years of this century. Since Mr. Hill's appointment, in August, 1876, the disbursements aggregate over twenty-three and a half millions. There are under his control one hundred and sixty-two public buildings outside the city of Washington, on which $1,088,973.32 have been expended for repairs under his direction. The last Congress provided for the erection of thirty-nine more, the appropriations for which aggregated $4,123,500. Each year new buildings are ordered, and all become a charge upon the Supervising Architect.

The discretionary power which must lie with the head of such an office is necessarily very great. He passes upon proposals, upon work to be performed, material to be furnished, prices to be paid, and then decides whether such proposals, work, material, and prices are acceptable to the Government. He assumes unrestricted power to plan buildings and equip them. He fixes the compensation of superintendents and inspectors, and he judges of the necessity and nature of repairs, alterations, and incidental additions.

In the case of the fire-proof shutters for the Cincinnati building he designates the firm to do the work, giving it to one not the lowest bidder by over $20,000. He passes upon a bill for extra work amounting to $26,000 on a contract that involved less than $200,000, and on his approval it was paid. He may award a contract to the lowest bidder and thereafter so change the plans as in effect to make a total abrogation of the contract, and the bills for extra work under such modified plans and specifications may grow to an enormous amount. This unlimited power that is assumed by the Supervising Architect would enable him, if so disposed, practically to abolish all competition in the interest of favorite contractors.

He gives an order for a safe or an elevator: he determines the slate-roof fastener.

disposed, practically to abolish all competition in the interest of favorite contractors.

He gives an order for a safe or an elevator; he determines the slate-roof fastener to be used; he designates the person who shall be paid thousands of dollars for making plans for heating apparatus, and he decides whether this heating apparatus shall be for steam or hot water. Whether a wall shall be of brick or stone is for him to say. Everything entering into the construction of a building must have his approval, and every dollar disbursed is practically paid because he recommends it. A proper understanding of many accounts of his office requires a technical knowledge of the business, so that the Auditor and Comptrollers who pass upon them can know little more than is shown upon their face. His approval, therefore, becomes final. To give it is to secure the payment of the money; to withhold it is to send the claimant to Congress or to the Court of Claims.

Theoretically, these are the acts of the Secretary of the Treasury, for under the law he is charged with this duty, while the Supervising Architect is simply in charge of the duties pertaining to that branch of the Secretary's office. He is without authority, either by statute or departmental regulation, to make a contract, to accept a bid, to advertise for proposals, or in any way to bind the Government in any case. The circular issued by Secretary Sherman, and bearing date June 11, 1877, made the Assistant Secretary, Hon. H. F. French, the legally responsible head of the Supervising Architect's office, and for all purposes of legalizing the acts of the Supervising Architect this is better than if it were done directly by the Supervising Architect this is better than if it were done directly by the Supervising Architect this is the technical knowledge of an architect is or ought to be required for the determination of questions coming within this discretion. The Secretary, therefore, is compelled expressitate to rely upon the judgment and advice of Supervising Archit

When placed at the head of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I knew but little about the system under which our public buildings have been erected. In the short time which I have been connected with the committee I have devoted all my spare time to a study of the subject, and though I have not mastered it, I feel competent to speak upon it. Congress has not, it seems to me, legislated wisely in the matter. If my recommendations were of any weight, Congress would no longer legislate upon the subject in the manner it has been doing. It has been authorizing the erection of public buildings without sufficient knowledge of the wants of the localities where they were authorized, and in many cases it has been deceived by the representations made, not only as to the necessities of the public service at many places, but as to the cost. but as to the cost.

Estimates have often been submitted with the deliberate purpose to mislead. I would recommend that hereafter Congress would pass no bill until it had before it all the information the Treasury Department could furnish on the merits of the several localities asking for public buildings. Then it can judge in which localities public buildings are most needed, and knowing what such buildings will cost, it will fully understand what it is doing. In providing for the erection of a public building the limit should be fixed and the whole amount appropriated at once, so that every part of the work may be contracted for at one time. If this is done, contracts can be obtained at less amounts than if the appropriate is done, the second contracts can be obtained at less amounts than if the appropriate is done, contracts can be obtained at less amounts than if the appropriate is good to be a second contracts. propriations are doled out in small amounts every year. The buildings having been authorized, and the limit of cost fixed in each case, the necessity of extending the limit would be rare indeed.

THE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

The Committee on Appropriations are not free from blame in making appropriations for public buildings, for it has often made appropriations for public buildings beyond the limit of cost fixed by law. It did this in several instances in the last session, and it has done so in every Congress for years. It has not given to the House the reasons for such extension.

for years. It has not given to the House the reasons for such extension. Such legislation has a germ of evil in it which has already developed into gigantic proportions. If Congress does not respect its own laws, but evades them by such phrases as "for the continuation (or completion) of the work" on a certain building, how can it expect the Executive Departments to respect them?

In the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was passed in this House a few days ago under whip and spur by a suspension of the rules, which cut off all debate except thirty minutes on a bill carrying $22,000,000, much of which was questionable, there were fifteen different instances of appropriations in excess of the limit fixed by law, in some of which the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds had reported adversely or had refused to report favorably. This is had reported adversely or had refused to report favorably. This is notably true of the appropriation of $20,000 to purchase land in Galveston, Tex.; $60,000 for an extension of limit at Columbus, Ohio, and an extension from $175,000 to $500,000 at Minneapolis, Minn. following is a list of appropriations beyond limit in that bill:

Buffalo: Limit, $175,000; appropriated, including furniture, $225,000. Limit exceeded, $50,000.

Charleston, W. Va.: Limit, $75,000; appropriated, $90,853.30. Limit exceeded, $15,853.30.
Columbus, Ohio: Limit, $250,000; appropriated, $310,000. Limit exceeded, $60,000. Not favorably considered by House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.
Dallas, Tex.: Limit, $75,000; appropriated, $100,000. Limit extended by bill to amount of appropriation.
Galveston: For site, $20,000. Not favorably considered by House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.
Greensborough, N. C.: Limit, $50,000; appropriated, including approaches, &c., $55,000.

$55,000. Jackson, Tenn.: Limit, $50,000; appropriated, including approaches, &c., So5,000.

Jefferson City, Mo.: Limit, $100,0000; appropriated, $132,000, and limit extended to amount of appropriation.

Kansas City, Mo.: Limit, $300,000; appropriated, $365,000.

Saint Joseph, Mo.: Limit, $75,000; appropriated, $140,000; limit extended to $300,000.

Leavenworth, Kans.: Limit, $100,000; appropriated, $160,000.
Montgomery, Ala.: Limit, $125,000; appropriated, $160,000.
Minneapolis, Minn.: Limit, $175,000; appropriated, $200,000; limit extended to $500,000. House Committee on Public Buildings and Ground's agreed to report extension of limit to $300,000.
Poughkeepsie, N. Y.: Limit, $75,000; appropriated, $125,000.
Shreveport, La.: Limit, $100,000; appropriated, including approaches, &c., $105,000.

Syracuse, N. Y.: Limit, $200,000; appropriated, $303,000.

To these the Senate has added more than a million dollars. The Committee on Appropriations and the Supervising Architect of the Treasury have been the fruitful instruments through which this immense and in most cases unnecessary increase of the limit of cost of public buildings has been accomplished—the Committee on Appropriations by ignoring the work of the proper committee and arrogating to itself the right to determine these increases, and the Supervising Architect ignoring the action of Congress fixing limits of cost. It is sincerely to be hoped that in future there will be less of both.

NEEDS OF GOVERNMENT ONLY BULE TO DETERMINE PLAN AND KIND OF BUILDING

The needs of the public service, and that only, should be the guide of the size and style of the building to be erected. When that is ascertained the material for its construction and the style of its architecture must depend upon the locality and somewhat upon the climate. A wise architect would not construct a building in New Orleans on the same plan as he would a building in New York, although it was intended for the same purposes. The style and ornamentation ought to be becoming to the simplicity of a republican people.

PURPOSES OF THE BILL.

In drawing the bill, which I hope to have acted upon before the ador favoritism. Will the House bear with me while I discuss these propositions?

Capt. A. H. Bowman, the engineer in charge, in his report of November 24, 1854, says:

vember 24, 1854, says:

The preparations of plans, specifications, estimates, and contracts in this office, under the immediate direction of the Department, where the number of occupants and the precise amount of business to be transacted in each building are known, has many advantages. Errors committed in buildings already in use can be avoided, a proper apportionment of office room made, and such an arrangement of the different offices as will facilitate the transaction of business effected. This can be better done when the conveniences and inconveniences of similar buildings are subjects of frequent discussion with those who occupy them than if the buildings were designed by some one less acquainted with the uses for which they are required, and who would probably be more likely to make a beautiful than a suitable structure.

This is the strongest statement made in favor of the Government's employing architects to design the public buildings to be erected by it that I have read. But it seems to me that if this argument was ever of great weight, it is less applicable now than when the report was made. "Architecture's noble art" was then known to but few people in this country; now in no country are there better architects practicing their profession in the United States. The amount of talent and vigor their profession in the United States. The amount of talent and vigor in the profession is seen in every part of the land, in the adaptation of structures to the uses for which they were intended, and at the same time in the designing of them according to well-matured views of harmony, beauty, and propriety. The architects outside of the construction branch of the Treasury are able to find out from observation of the public buildings already erected, and from conversation with those who use them, what is best suited to the public wants, as well as the Supervising Architect or his subordinates. I have not, however, my own opinion to depend upon. Mr. William A. Potter, late Supervising Architect, in his report of October 1, 1876, took the same position. He said:

I desire particularly to invite your attention to a subject which presented itself to me very shortly after my entering upon the duties of this office. I refer to the manner in which designs are prepared for the public buildings erected under the Treasury Department. These designs have heretofore been made by the Supervising Architect, and have been so made up to the present time, but the very strong reasons which present themselves against this practice have convinced me that it should be remedied as speedily as may be. I have given much thought to this subject, and while I am not now prepared to present for your consideration any specific plan by which the radical defects of this method of procedure in designing the public buildings throughout the country may be remedied, the vital point of any system which may be adopted must be to remove the power from the Supervising Architect to make designs, and restrict his duties to those simply of a supervisory nature. I will, as concisely as possible, state what reasons have led me to form my opinions in regard thereto.

Experience has shown that it is difficult, if not impossible, to separate the office of the Supervising Architect from political control to a greater or less degree, and thus it is possible that the incumbent may be, both by nature and want of proper study and experience, totally unfit to fulfill this most responsible duty, and the country is liable thereby to be burdened by structure unterly lacking in those architectural qualities which should be found in the works of a great nation. The stamp of inefficiency so imprinted in the national architecture is not of a nature soon to pass away, for not only will it remain itself a monument to a vicious system, but its teachings for evil can never be fully estimated. But should this evil be escaped, there remain yet others.

The immense amount of routine work which occupies the attention of the Supervising Architect, the varied nature of the duties which devolve upon him, and the fact that he is at no time free from interruption, leave him no opportunity for the proper study of the designs which he is required to make. This work is done under all the disadvantages of want of time, want of quiet, and almost entire preoccupation with other matters, which must always result in work of an imperfect and unsatisfactory character. Architecture is an art, and like all arts he who practices it successfully must give himself up to it without restraint. No good work has ever been done without severe study, and the artist must be able to throw himself unreservedly into the contemplation of the problem. And, furthermore, the objects for which the buildings erected in this office are constructed are, with very slight exceptions, so nearly alike, that the difficulty, the impossibilit

I can add nothing to the weight of these words, but I desire to call attention to the indorsement of Mr. Potter's recommendation by Mr. James G. Hill, who succeeded Mr. Potter as Supervising Architect, in his report for October 1, 1876, as follows:

I desire to call attention to the remarks in the last annual report of the Supervising Architect in regard to the manner in which designs for the public buildings are prepared, and to recommend the passage of an act by Congress requiring such designs to be obtained under competition, and that the duties of the Supervising Architect be restricted to those of a supervising architect.

Such a law is asked for by the architects of the country, who feel that the Government is not treating them as their character and talents deserve in providing that the public buildings shall be designed by one man, who holds the office of Supervising Architect, and Mr. Potter was only speaking the universal opinion of his fellow-architects when he recommended that the designing of public buildings be given to other architects. I think the character of the buildings erected since the war will show that the words of Mr. Potter were wise and timely.

war will show that the words of Mr. Potter were wise and timely.

The system by which designs for public buildings should be attained is by no means a settled question. If a private person wants a building erected he goes to the architect in whom he has greatest confidence and arranges with him for designs, or if the building is to be large and expensive he may ask several architects to make designs. But it has been found that in public business such a course would soon create scandal and lead to fraud and corruption. The best means so far devised is to have a board of competent persons to select one plan from a number of plans offered by architects competing for the first prize. If the board is composed of competent judges, and the competition is honestly and fairly conducted, the chances are that ninety-nine times in a hundred the best plan will be selected, and a good plan is sure to be secured in every in-

The problem is to have a board of competent persons, free from any political bias, who will honestly conduct the competition. This bill political bias, who will honestly conduct the competition. This bill provides that a board of seven persons, consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, the Attorney-General, the Chief Engineer of the Army, the Supervising Architect, the Architect of the Capitol, and an architect selected by the President, shall select the plans for the public buildings. The Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General are put upon the board because they are at the head of the Departments which will occupy the buildings, and they ought to pass upon the arrangement of them.

Objection has been made that they can not understand architecture well enough to decide between plans. That is by no means certain. Men can often form a good judgment of things which they could not possibly make, and a board composed entirely of architects would not, in my opinion, be as successful as it would be if there were several laymen upon it. And who is a better judge of a building than the head of nn my opinion, be as successful as it would be if there were several laymen upon it. And who is a better judge of a building than the head of the Department which is to use it? The three architects on the board will be able to inform the others as to the points in architecture, and the Chief Engineer, who must be something of an artist, can judge between them. Other plans there may be, but none have been presented to me which promise to work as well as this. But if a better plan can be devised the committee will unhesitatingly accept it.

This board will also have charge of the selection of sites, the decision as to what materials shall be used in the construction of buildings, the letting of contracts, &c. There can not be much fraud practiced on such a board, and favoritism can not well find place among them; and under the rule that everything which is done must be published to the world, the chances are that neither extravagance nor corruption can gain a foothold in the board, and we shall have the public buildings designed and erected with as few faults and as few scandals as are possible among men.

PARTISAN POLITICS.

The evils of partisan politics are nowhere greater than when they are obtruded into the business of the erection of public buildings. If a Senator or Representative in Congress succeeds in having a public building in his State or district, the greatest harm that is done is that building in his State or district, the greatest harm that is done is that a building is erected which could have been done without for several years; but when they bring a pressure to bear upon the Architect's Office to have contracts let to persons solely on account of party reasons, or have superintendents of buildings appointed for the same reason, they often do great harm to the public interests.

To prevent such things the bill places the construction of the public buildings solely in the hands of the Supervising Architect, who is made responsible for the manner in which the work is done. And in order that he may have the whole matter in his own hands he is given the appointment of superintendents of buildings, for whom annual salaries are provided instead of a per diem wage, so that there may be no inducement to prolong the erection of a public building beyond the time necessary for its construction.

A few words more and I have done. There are few matters of greater A few words more and I have done. There are few matters of greater importance than that of providing a new system under which public buildings may be erected. If this, which I have proposed and the committee have perfected, is not a good one, provide another, but do not let this Congress adjourn until we have attempted to adopt a new system of designing and constructing public buildings. To me it is of little importance how it is done or who does it so it is done well.

In criticising the conduct of the office of Supervising Architect I deor capacity of Mr. Bell, the present Supervising Architect. In the short time he has been at the head of the office I have seen nothing in the administration of its affairs that is not commendable. But the interests involved are too great to leave their determination to one officer, however capable and honest he may be, unless his duties and powers are defined and limited by law.

Alcoholic Liquor Traffic Commission.

HON. WILLIAM E. ENGLISH,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 23, 1885.

The House having under consideration the bill (H.R. 2142) to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic—

Mr. ENGLISH said:

Mr. SPEAKER: As a member of the Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, to whom this bill was referred, and as the author of the report made thereon to the House, I desire the attention of the House for a few remarks in connection therewith. This bill provides for the appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of a commission of seven persons to investigate the alcoholic liquof traffic, its relations to revenue and taxation, and its general economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and the general welfare of the people; and also to inquire as to the practical results of license and prohibitory legislation in the several States of the Union.

In so far as the proposed investigation of the said traffic relates to revenue and taxation, I am of the opinion that all necessary information important for the General Government to have on that subject is already accessible, and that there is no need of an investigation by a special commission. And in so far as it relates to its general economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects, and the practical results of license and prohibitory legislation in the several States, I am of the belief that it is better to leave these matters to investigation and regulation by the law-making power of the States themselves rather than by the General Government. This bill was referred by the Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic to a subcommittee of three, of which I had the honor to be the chairman. At the request of a majority of that subground which was adopted by the full committee without change and with but one dissenting voice. Mr. Speaker, as is stated in that report, I can not see that there is any great, urgent necessity for the passage of this bill, even if it were admitted that Congress had the right to enact this sort of legislation.

Since 1873 the advocates of a national prohibitory law have been endeavoring to procure the adoption by Congress of legislation of this character, and I am in duty compelled to say that I can not conscientiously support any measure here which looks to the enaction of absolute prohibition. I believe that the great majority of those who clamor for laws of this nature are conscientious and honest in their intentions, and firm believers in the theories which they advocate; but, Mr. Speaker, these are, in my opinion, theories which the history of past events show can never be made practical. I am earnestly in favor of every movement for the promotion of temperance and sobriety, and will support ever proper measure to that end; but I believe those interests to be injured rather than advanced by intemperate efforts at absolute prohibition. In several of the States strict prohibitory laws have been adopted; but it would seem that little success has followed the experiment, and that there has been no very apparent lessening of the evils of intemperance in those States.

In the State of Maine prohibitory laws have been upon the statute-

In the State of Maine prohibitory laws have been upon the statute-books more or less continuously for thirty years, and yet I take it that it will not be positively claimed that the liquor traffic has been really suppressed in that State. And in the States of Iowa and Kansas the public press statements indicate that the efforts at absolute prohibition have not been conspicuously successful, and it would appear that one of the worst results of the law there has been to decrease the use of beer and other lighter and less harmful drinks and to greatly increase the use of strong drink of the worst grades manufactured. I clip the following from a leading Republican paper on the practical workings of the law in the State of Iowa:

Conviction is made difficult from the fact that nearly all the business men are opposed to the law in sympathy with the liquor dealers. Formerly a large amount of beer was sold, but it is so bulky that its transportation and storage without detection is almost impossible, and as whisky can be carried about the person, whisky of the vilest quality is the only beverage.

I believe that the only true method of dealing with the liquor traffic is by a strong, stringent license system faithfully and rigidly enforced, I believe that the only true method of dealing with the inquor tanks is by a strong, stringent license system faithfully and rigidly enforced, and around which is thrown every wise, proper, and necessary restriction—a well-regulated and well-executed system, which will promote the virtues of sobriety and temperance, while duly regarding the personal and property rights of the citizen. There is an inherent disposition in all mankind to resent any unreasonable or arbitrary attempts to interfere with their natural rights, and laws to be effectively administered must be sustained by public opinion and must not conflict with the inalienable rights which naturally belong to a free people. Otherwise the evil aimed at will in the end rather be increased than diminished. These are among the important reasons why absolute prohibition never has been and in my opinion never can be really successful. The people demand reasonable and just laws faithfully executed rather than fanatical and impractical measures invasive of personal rights and not in accord with public sentiment.

Mr. Speaker, I have not arrived at my conclusions upon this important subject without due consideration. I have had previous occasion to give this matter much thought and investigation. At the time of my election to Congress this was the all-absorbing issue of the campaign. A prohibition amendment to the constitution of Indiana was pending,

A prohibition amendment to the constitution of Indiana was pending, A promotion amendment to the constitution of indiana was pending, and upon this issue the two great parties divided—the Republicans favoring the submission and adoption of the amendment, and the Democracy in opposition thereto. I had the honor of presiding over the first convention held in the State that took a stand against the amendment, and the convention which unanimously nominated me as a candidate for Congress declared unconditional opposition to all prohibitory and sumptuary legislation; and upon this platform I was elected to Congress from a district heretofore Republican after an expertionally class. gress from a district heretofore Republican after an exceptionally close and exciting contest.

I gave the question a full investigation then, and I have still further investigated it during the consideration of the pending bill, and the more thoroughly I examine the subject the more strongly am I confirmed in my previous convictions of opposition to prohibitory legisla-tion. However, I shall not detain the House further in this connection or attempt to discuss the bill fully in all its various aspects, but in conclusion will read the following extract from my report, previously made upon this bill, as more clearly setting forth my views upon this very important measure:

The power to regulate the retail liquor traffic has, from the foundation of the Union, been regarded as the exclusive right of the States rather than of the General Government. Attempts have been made by some of the States to entirely prohibit the manufacture or sale of spirituous or mail tiquors, but with little apparent success, and the interests of true temperance and sobriety, so much to be desired, would seem to demand wise and stringent restrictions and effective safeguards in connection with the liquor traffic rather than impractical efforts at absolute prohibition. To the several States of the Union properly belongs the right to enact such local police regulations as will throw every proper restriction around the liquor traffic compatible with the personal and property rights of the citizen, but uniform police regulations enacted by Congress practically suited to the different wants and requirements of the people of all the various States would be difficult to frame and more difficult to execute.

Any attempt to control the personal habits and private conduct of the individual should be opposed, so long as he does not interfere with the personal rights of others or the peace and order of society in general. As it is a matter of grave doubt whether Congress has the right to regulate the liquour traffic in the several States of the Union, and as there seems to be no great, pressing, or urgent necessity for the passage of this bill, your committee hold that it is not advisable to attempt the exercise of doubtful powers by the General Government in these matters which appear more properly to belong to the States themselves. Your committee therefore recommend that the bill be reported back to the House with a recommendation that it do not pass, and they ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Contested Election-Massey vs. Wise.

SPEECH

HON. MORTIMER F. ELLIOTT.

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, March 3, 1885,

On the contested-election case of Massey vs. Wise.

Mr. ELLIOTT said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Having submitted to the House the report of the committee in this case, I deem it my duty to state the reasons govern-ing the majority in reporting that John S. Wise was duly elected a member of Congress from the State of Virginia and that he is entitled to memor of congress from the State of Virginia and that he is entitled to retain the seat which he now occupies.

John S. Wise and John E. Massey were opposing candidates at the November election in 1882 for the position of Representative in Congress from the State of Virginia at large. According to the returns as certified by the State board of canvassers, Wise received at said election certified by the State board of canvassers, Wise received at said election 99,992 votes, and Massey, his competitor, received 94,184 votes, giving Wise a majority of 5,808. The contestant seeks to overcome this apparent majority, and in his brief claims that the contestee received 15,712 illegal votes, which, deducted from the number of votes returned as cast for him, would elect the contestant by quite a decided majority. These votes, with a few exceptions, are claimed by the contestant to be illegal for the following reasons:

By the laws of Virginia the payment of a capitation tax of $1 prior to the day of election is made a prerequisite to the right to vote. A very large number of the citizens of Virginia neglected to pay the capitation tax assessed against them to the officers first charged with the collection of the same.

The revenue laws of Virginia so far as they relate to the questions

The revenue laws of Virginia so far as they relate to the questions involved in this case are as follows:

SEC. 23. The treasurer (of each county or city), after ascertaining which of the taxes assessed in his county or corporation can not be collected, shall as soon as practicable in each year, after the 15th day of June, make out lists of three classes, to wit, first, a list of property on commissioner's land-book improperly placed thereon, &c.; secondly, a list of other real estate, &c.; and thirdly, a list of such of the taxes so assessed, other than on real estate, as he is unable to col-

SEC. 25. The first and third lists mentioned shall be verified by the oath of the treasurer and his deputies to the effect that they verily believe no part of the taxes or levies embraced has been or could have been collected.

Section 26 of same act provides that said lists shall be presented to the court, and the court, if satisfied as to their correctness, shall direct the clerk to certify copies thereof to the auditor of public accounts.

Section 29 of same act is as follows:

A certified copy of the first and third lists heretofore returned shall be placed by the auditor of public accounts, within sixty days after receiving the originals, or as soon thereafter as practicable, in the hands of any sheriff, sergeant, constable, or collector for collection, the same to be accounted for within one year thereafter; said officers to have the same power of distress as treasurers, and shall account for the same in like manner, and he and his sureties shall be subject to all such remedies as are given to the Commonwealth against treasurers for failure to pay, and his compensation shall not exceed 20 per cent. of the amount collected and paid into the treasury.

Prior to the election in 1882 the auditor of public accounts, S. Brown Allen, appointed a collector for each city and county in the State and placed in their hands the delinquent personal property and capitation taxes which had been certified to him by the clerks of the different counties of the State.

The form used in making the appointment of collectors was as fol-

DEAR SIR: Inclosed herein I send you a list of delinquent capitation and personal-property taxes for —— county for the year 1881, amounting to the sum of $-, and hereby appoint you collector of the same pursuant to section 29 of the act approved April 1, 1879, prescribing the duties of certain county officers, &c. You will please sign the inclosed receipt for said list, and, together with the bond herein duly executed, return the same to me.

I am, very respectfully,

S. BROWN ALLEN.

S. BROWN ALLEN,
Auditor of Public Accounts.

The testimony shows that the two collectors appointed by the auditor of public accounts issued capitation-tax receipts to the number of from fifteen to sixteen thousand. Perhaps twelve hundred of this number were issued either in blank without payment of the tax, or on election day. I am compelled to estimate the number issued in blank and on election day, as the witnesses are not able to state the number with on election day, as the witnesses are not able to state the number with accuracy. Indeed, they all say they do not know the number so issued. The evidence shows that the remainder of the receipts were issued by the collectors prior to the day of election, and they were paid for and the names of the tax-payers were inserted in the receipts prior to their delivery. It is true that a great number of these receipts were paid for by and delivered to others than the persons against whom the taxes were assessed.

The contestant contends that the auditor of public accounts had no power to appoint collectors to receive the capitation tax, and that the payment of such tax to the collectors appointed by him was no payment, and the votes cast on such receipts were illegal and should be thrown out for that reason. Section 29 of the revenue laws of Virginia, which I have read, provides that the delinquent lists shall be placed by the auditor in the hands of any sheriff, constable, or collector for collection. It is contended by the contestant that the section referred to contemplates that the delinquent-list shall be placed in the hands of an existing officer, and does not give the auditor power to appoint collectors. I think there is much force in this position, but I shall not attempt to elaborate my views upon it, as I do not deem it necessary to determine that question.

The auditor of public accounts was at the head of the revenue deartment of Virginia. He had the supervision of the collection of the delinquent personal and capitation taxes certified to him by the respective county clerks, and it became his duty under the law to place them in the hands of one or more sheriffs, sergeants, constables, or collectors for such purpose, and even if he was not authorized, under a proper construction of the revenue laws of Virginia, to select private persons as collectors, yet such persons so appointed to collect the delinquent taxes were acting under color of office, and the tax-payers were not bound, at the peril of forfeiting their right to vote, to know whether the auditor had exceeded his powers in appointing them.

The purpose of the law was to compel the payment of the tax, and that purpose was accomplished and the money reached the treasury through these collectors, the accredited agents of the auditor; and it would be manifestly unjust to hold that the citizens who paid their taxes in good faith to the persons held out by the auditor of public accounts as the proper ones to receive them should be disfranchised, because it is doubtful whether the auditor did not exceed his authority.

Auditor Allen did not inaugurate the practice of appointing tax-collectors to receive the delinquent personal and capitation taxes. John E. Massey, the contestant, was the auditor who preceded Allen, and he appointed collectors in every county of Virginia to receive the delinquent personal and capitation taxes.

Mr. Massey when he was auditor had no doubt of his right to appoint these collectors. He appointed them in 1880 and again in 1881, and in many instances Allen appointed them in 1880 and again in 1881, and in many instances Allen appointed the same persons who in previous years had been appointed by Massey.

I do not mean to be understood that Massey is estopped by his own conduct from saying that the appointment of these collectors was without authority of law; I refer to the fact merely to show that it had been the practice for two years prior to 1882 for the anditor to appoint these the practice for two years prior to 1882 for the auditor to appoint these collectors, and that I think greatly strengthens my position that they were acting under color of office.

The contestant can hardly ask the House to say that these collectors were not acting under color of office. I judge that the friends of Mr. Massey would rather they had some other and better reason for overturning a majority of nearly 6,000 votes than that he did what he knew to be illegal or that he was profoundly ignorant of his duties.

A word in relation to the point made that the tax was not in all cases paid by the voter himself. The rule is well settled that a tax may be paid by an agent as well as by the person himself, and although the person paying the tax was not authorized to do so prior to its pay-ment, yet the voter by accepting the receipt adopts the act and as of the date when the payment was made.

The courts have passed upon this very question, and I quote from the opinion in one of the cases I have examined.

In re District Attorney of Dauphin County, 11 Philadelphia Reports, 649, the court says:

From the adoption of the Constitution in 1790 down to the present time the practice to pay taxes through an agent has always been held as good and valid as when done by the voter in person, and the presentation of the receipt at the polls and claiming the right to vote by virtue of it has always been considered sufficient evidence of the adoption of the agency.

It is averred, however, in the petition, and when that is demurred to we must take it to be true, that these voters had their taxes paid without their knowledge or previous authority conferred on the person paying.

We must hold in this as in other cases, that a subsequent ratification is equivalent to an original command. * * The only doubt which can exist on this branch of the case arises out of the constitutional mandate that the tax must be paid at least thirty days before the election, and whether the voter is obliged to show that he assumed and acknowledged the payment by the agent before that time.

On careful consideration we are satisfied that the ratification adopts the extended to the consideration and co

On careful consideration we are satisfied that the ratification adopts the act as of the time of its performance. It is thus carried back by relation to that period. Such is the doctrine laid down by ancient and modern writers and by udicial decisions.

From what I have said my conclusions are obvious, that the votes cast on receipts issued by the tax-collectors appointed by the auditor of public accounts, which were paid for by the voters or other persons for them prior to the day of election, were legal votes, and were properly received and counted. If, however, I am not correct in this position, it is impossible to determine from the evidence for whom the persons who voted on these tax-receipts cast their ballots.

I am satisfied that a large portion of this vote in some of the counties was cast for Wise; and I have a suspicion that it was pretty generally cast for him throughout the State, but I challenge any man on this floor to make a list of a thousand persons by name who voted for Wise on these tax-receipts. XVI---169

The evidence upon the subject is that the collectors were members of the Readjuster party; that Readjusters paid the taxes and took the receipts, that these receipts were used largely by the colored voters, and that as a class they favored Wise.

Under evidence so vague and uncertain as this where would you commence to throw out votes? Suppose you find John Jones on the list as having voted and he is also marked as a colored voter, could you throw out his vote and take it off Wise on the proof that the tax-receipts were issued largely to colored voters, and that they, as a rule, to which there were confessedly exceptions, favored Wise?

There is no proof as to who Lohn Lones favored what party he ested

There is no proof as to who John Jones favored, what party he acted with, whether he voted on one of the tax-receipts issued by Allen's collectors or not, but from this exceedingly general evidence as to the political affiliations of the colored men as a class it is proposed to throw out his vote. How do you know he is not one of the colored men who voted for Massey; perhaps one who had not yet learned that Massey had ceased to be a Readjuster?

No rule has as yet been established by the courts or by Congress which would justify the indiscriminate throwing out of votes upon such loose and uncertain testimony.

I need not dwell longer on this branch of the case, as the minority of the committee in their report concede that it would be unwise under the department of the State the circumstances to reverse the decision of the department of the State government which is in charge of the tax system of Virginia. The minority say:

There can be no doubt that many capitation-tax receipts were issued in blank; that many were issued on the day of election, and that many were issued in gross and then distributed; and it is claimed with much force that any payment of taxes for delinquent voters without the authority previously given, especially when made by political agencies, approximates bribery.

But we can not say that the evidence is clear that a sufficient number of votes illegal for any cause were cast for the sitting member to justify the rejection of his majority.

Thus it will be seen that all the members of the Elections Committee agree that Wise was duly elected. The case was heard at great length by the full committee, and their unanimous verdict ought to have some weight with this House. It is a case requiring weeks of patient investigation to understand, and this House of necessity, so far as the questions of fact are concerned, must depend largely upon the committee. It is claimed, however, by the contestant and by the minority of the committee that the sitting member has since his election disqualified himself from holding the office of Representative in Congress. It is claimed that the contestee, after his term of office as Representative commenced, was appointed by the Attorney-General to an office under the United States, which he continued to hold until he qualified as a member of the House. Article 1, section 6, last clause, of the Constitution of the United States is as follows:

And no person holding an office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

The only evidence before the committee on the subject was the admissions of the contestee made during the arguments of counsel. He stated that on the 5th day of March, 1883, he was employed by the Attorney-General to assist the United States district attorney of Virginia in the trial of certain enumerated cases then pending in the United States district court of Virginia; that all the cases had not been disposed of, and that he expected to assist at the trial of the cases still undetermined when they should come on to be heard.

The contestee by the terms of his agreement with the Attorney-General was to receive for his services as special counsel in said cases not less than five hundred nor more than one thousand dollars, as the Attorney-General should thereafter determine.

Under these facts was the contestee appointed to an office within the meaning of the clause of the Constitution which I have quoted? And if the arrangement between him and the Attorney-General constituted him an officer, did he continue such officer after he qualified and entered upon the performance of the duties of a member of Congress?

The contestee was employed by the Attorney-General under section

363 of the Revised Statutes, which is as follows:

The Attorney-General shall, whenever in his opinion the public interest requires it, employ and retain in the name of the United States such attorneys and counselors at law as he may think necessary to assist the district attorneys in the discharge of their duties, and shall stipulate with such assistant attorneys and counselors the amount of compensation, and shall have supervision of their conduct and proceedings.

It will be seen that the Attorney-General is not authorized to appoint an officer of the United States. He is simply authorized to retain and employ attorneys and counselors at law whenever in his judgment the regular law officers of the Government need assistance in the trial of cases in which the Government has an interest. To retain an attorney to assist in the trial of a case for the Government is no more the appointment to an office than the hiring of a lawyer by a private individual would be. The Government is the client of the attorney so hired, and his employment ceases with the entry of final judgment in the case he is employed to try, or sooner if the agent of the Government thinks proper to dismiss him and retain another attorney. When so retained the position of the attorney is essentially that of an employe under contract, the contract alone defining his duties and fixing the measure of his compensation for the work he has agreed to per-form. His duties are not defined nor is his compensation fixed by law. If he is an officer what is his name, what is his tenure, what his duties, and does the office continue in case of his death or resignation? Is he an officer when the jury retires for deliberation, and when the verdict is rendered and judgment entered does he cease to be one, and is the office itself abolished by the ending of the case?

If Wise had been employed to try one case he would have been an officer of the Government the same as though he had been retained to try fifty cases

Suppose him to be trying the case on the day before the first meeting of the Congress to which he was elected, if the verdict is rendered on that day his term of office has expired before he is required to qualify as a member of Congress and his seat in this House has not been forfeited; but if the jury deliberate past midnight and the verdict is rendered in the afternoon of the next day, he was continuing in office under the Government at the time he qualified as a member of Congress and thereby forfeited his right to a seat in this House.

Is it not clear that Wise occupied a contract relation to the United States, and not that of an officer of the Government? He agrees for $1,000 to assist the Government in the trial of ten of her cases and receives a retainer at the time the agreement is made. Would he not have been liable under that contract if he had refused to perform it according to its terms? Could he have kept the retainer and refused to perform any service under the agreement?

The term "office" embraces the ideas of tenure, emoluments, and duties, and the latter must be continuing and permanent, not occasional and temporary. Authorities are numerous and satisfying on this question, and I will refer the House to a few of them. Chief-Justice Marshall, in United States vs. Maurice et al., 2 Brockenbrough's Reports,

Although an office is an employment it does not follow that every employment is an office. A man may certainly be employed under a contract, express or implied, to do an act or perform a service without becoming an officer. But if a duty be a continuing one, which is defined by rules prescribed by the Government and not by a contract, which an individual is appointed by Government to perform, who enters on the duties appertaining to his station without any contract defining them, if these duties continue though the person be changed, it seems very difficult to distinguish such a charge or employment from an office.

In United States vs. Hartwell, 6 Wallace, 385, the Supreme Court

An office is a public station or employment conferred by the appointment of Government, and embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties.

The case of the United States vs. Germaine (99 United States Reports, 508) is directly in point, and in principle rules the question raised in this case.

The defendant in that case was appointed by the Commissioner of Pensions to act as surgeon, under the act of Congress of March 3, 1873, which is as follows:

That the Commissioner of Pensions be, and is hereby, empowered to appoint at his discretion civil surgeons to make the periodical examinations of pensioners which are or may be required by law, and to examine applicants for pensions when he shall deem an examination by a surgeon appointed by him necessary, and the fee for such examinations and the required certificates thereof in duplicate, including postage on such as are transmitted to pension agents, shall be $2, which shall be paid by the agent for paying pensions in the district in which the pensioner or claimant resides, out of any money appropriated for the payment of pensions, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe.

He was indicted in the district of Maine for extortion in taking fees from pensioners to which he was not entitled. The law under which he was indicted is as follows:

Every officer of the United States who is guilty of extortion under color of his office shall be punished by fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment not more than one year, according to the aggravation of the offense.

The question presented to the supreme court was whether the surgeon was an officer of the United States. The court held that the defendant was not an officer of the United States, and in the course of the opinion use the following language:

If we look to the nature of the defendant's employment we think it equally clear that he is not an officer. In that case (referring to United States vs. Hartwell, 6 Wallace, 385) the court said the term embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties, and that the latter were continuing and permanent, not occasional and temporary. In the case before us the duties are not continuing and permanent, and they are occasional and intermittent. The surgeon is only to act when called on by the Commissioner of Pensions in some special case.

If this case is to be followed, it is clear that the contestee was not an officer of the United States at the time he qualified as a member of

The contestant in his original brief, when considering the power of the auditor of public accounts to appoint tax-collectors, states the position which I have taken on this question with much force. He says:

One who performs duties under contract is not an officer, but one who acts under law prescribing and requiring their duties concerning the public seems to be considered an officer. * * An officer is one who exercises a power continuously and as a part of the regular and permanent administration of the Government. * * * An office implies tenure, duration, fees, rights, powers, and duties [citing Burrill's Law Dictionary, 767].

If these extracts which I have read from page 3 of the contestants'

original brief state the correct doctrine, what becomes of his subsequent allegation that the contestee was an officer of the United States?

I have taken more time, perhaps, than was necessary in discussing the question whether Wise was an officer of the United States by virtue of his contract with the Attorney-General. I do not think it very material to a proper decision of this case to determine whether Wise held an office under the United States at the time he qualified as a member of Congress. It has been many times determined by this House that a member-elect may continue to exercise the functions of an office under the United States which he held prior to his election or to which he was appointed after his election down to the time when the time arrives for him to enter upon the performance of the duties of a member of Congress

When that time arrives he must make his election which of the two offices he will hold from that date. If he appears upon the floor of the House on the day it is organized and takes the oath of office, he elects to hold the office of Representative, and such election is equivalent to a formal resignation of the other office, and from that moment forward he can no more perform the functions of the other office than he could had he formally resigned and the resignation been accepted.

It is true that Wise stated before the committee that he expected to assist at the trial of the cases yet undisposed of, but I can not see how that is of a feather's weight. If he had been United States district attorney for Virginia on the first Monday of December, 1883, and as member of Congress elect he had appeared upon that day and been sworn as a member, would not such action on his part have operated as a legal abandonment of the office of district attorney, and could he have continued himself as such officer by his declaration made a month afterward that he intended to hold on to the office of district attorney

If, instead of taking upon himself the obligations of a member of Congress the first moment he could do so, he had continued after the meeting of Congress to perform the duties of district attorney, his continuing to exercise the functions of that office would have been treated as an election to continue as district attorney and an abandonment of the position of member of Congress. The first moment he was under obligation to elect between the two offices he did so, and his right to the one, the duties of which he had been lawfully performing up to that time, was absolutely gone.

Authorities upon this point are more than abundant. I quote from McCrary on Elections, section 239:

If there is a statutory or constitutional provision prohibiting the same person to hold both the offices at the same time, then of course the question of their incompatibility does not necessarily arise, for in such case the acceptance of the second is type facto the abandonment and resignation of the first, though the duties of the two may be entirely compatible.

In the case of General Robert C. Schenck it was held that his acceptance of the position of major-general of volunteers after his election as a Representative did not operate as a forfeiture of his seat as a member a Representative did not operate as a forfeiture of his seat as a member of Congress, he having resigned the position of major-general prior to the meeting of Congress. If he had not resigned but had appeared and qualified as a member of Congress the first moment he could have done so, such action on his part would have had the same effect upon the office of major-general as did his formal resignation.

The facts in General Blair's case were the same as in that of General Schenck's, except that Blair continued to hold his commission in the Army and to everyise his functions under it after the meeting of Congress and the same as in the process of the same and the everyise his functions under it after the meeting of Congress and the same as in the Army and to exercise his functions under it after the meeting of Con-After the time came for him to enter upon the duties of member of Congress he continued to perform the duties of an officer of the Army, and this House held that by refusing to qualify as a member of Congress at the first opportunity, and continuing to act as an officer of the Army, he elected to retain his office in the Army and abandoned the office of member of Congress

Mr. DAWES, the then chairman of the Committee on Elections, in the course of his very able report in the Blair case, says:

A man in the discharge of the duties of one office is tendered another whose duties he is required to enter upon at a certain time, but the functions of both he can not perform. When the time arrives at which the duties of the latter office commence he is at liberty to choose. If he takes the latter the functions of the former, pso facto*, cease as the result of his choice. When he accepts one office the law interprets the act as a surrender of any incompatible office.

I again quote from McCrary on Elections, section 243:

There can be no doubt but that the accepting of the office of Representative in Congress and entering upon the discharge of its duties amounts to a resignation and abandonment of any incompatible office previously held, and hence a formal resignation is not necessary in any such case.

My position on this case, briefly stated, is this: John S. Wise, the contestee, was duly elected by a majority of from four to five thousand votes over his competitor, John E. Massey, the contestant; that he did not at any time after the 3d of March, 1883, hold any other office under the United States, but that if he did, if what I call an employment to try a given number of cases should be held to be an office within the meaning of the Constitution, then that, under all the authorities on the subject, including the precedents in this House, he had a right to accept another office even after his election, and continue to exercise the functions thereof down to the time when he could qualify as a member of Congress. Then he was bound to elect which office he would hold, which he did by qualifying as a member of this House on the first day Congress convened. Such election was an abandonment of the office, if such employment can be dignified as an office, which he received by appointment from the Attorney-General.

There is not a single line of authority in conflict with these positions, especially the latter, and it seems to me that it is the imperative duty of the House to declare that John S. Wise is entitled to retain the seat he now occupies.

Note by Mr. Turner, of Georgia.—While the argument in this case was pending before the Committee on Elections on the question involved, Mr. Wise, in propria persona, stated in effect that he intended to continue in the position which he occupied under sections 363 and 366 of the Revised Statutes as special assistant to the United States district attorney of the eastern district of Virginia, and based his defense on this question upon the proposition that this position was not "any office" under the Constitution. It was on this account that the reports of the majority and of the minority of the committee did not discuss the effect of his qualification as a member of the House upon the tenure of his position under the Department of Justice. I reassert my entire confidence in the views presented in the minority report, and regret that I can not now present the argument in support of that report.

HON. ORLANDO B. POTTER,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 15, 1885.

The House having under consideration the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations—

Mr. POTTER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In discussing this measure, with the disposition on the part of the House to close debate at an early hour, it is apparent to me that no such thorough discussion of the question as its magnitude demands can possibly occur. With regard to the bill now before the House, having given at least as much consideration as average men to this subject, I entertain the clear and undoubting opinion that instead this subject, I entertain the clear and undoubting opinion that instead of strengthening the credit of the country, instead of answering the end which it proposes to meet, it is likely it will tend strongly, and I believe it will be the first step that will inevitably lead, to the overthrow of our system of banking in this country.

What are the difficulties of the present hour? They are simply these, that the bonds of this country have gone to so high a premium under the operation of the laws that exist, that citizens can no longer profitably use them for purposes of banking. The difficulty is that the bonds that can now be used, that are not already due and payable, are at a premium—the four-and-a-halfs, due in about seven years, and the fours, due in twenty-two and a half years, are severally at a premium of from 12 to 14 and from 20 to 25 per cent.

of from 12 to 14 and from 20 to 25 per cent.

What does this bill propose? It proposes inevitably to increase that premium and aggravate the difficulty. It proposes that banks shall be allowed to issue 10 per cent. more in bills upon the bonds. And what is the effect of that? To make the bonds worth for that purpose 10 per cent. more in market. The premium instead of being on the fours 22 to 25, as it has averaged during the last year, will be from 25 to 30 at least. Under the operation of the premium that exists, and has existed during the past year, bankers have been disposed to sell their bonds in order to realize the premiums and thus to diminish the circulation of the country. And yet we are asked to increase directly the premium upon the bonds in order that they may be profitably, as it is said, induced to increase circulation. That this bill can have no such effect, that with certainty it will have precisely the contrary effect, such effect, that with certainty it will have precisely the contrary effect, can not be doubted by any one who has studied the question.

But, sir, it is not merely this that is the only or principal objection to this bill. There is another objection that surely this House, in charge of the revenue legislation of this county, should not disregard. We owe, sir, a large debt, and there are but $190,000,000 of it payable within the next seven years. At the rate at which the public debt has been paid during the last two years we are inevitably confronted within two years or a little more from this time with this state of facts: With our Treasury full perhaps overflowing money yield up in the Treasury. our Treasury full, perhaps overflowing, money piled up in the Treasury of the United States, and not one dollar of debt which we can pay for the next five years thereafter, we are asked by this bill to place the nation, of whose financial interests we are the guardians, and for which this House is responsible, upon its knees during those five years before the holders of the 4 per cent. bonds, to ask them at what price the nation may pay its debt!

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?
Mr. POTTER. I have but a short time, and I would rather not be interrupted.

By this legislation we are asked to raise the premium on these bonds to at least from 5 to 10 per cent., when we know that within two years this Government must be upon its knees before those very 4 per cent. bondholders, and must accept whatever terms they shall see fit to grant. If there were no other objectionable feature than that in this bill, it should restrain every member of this House from voting for such a proposition.

But, sir, there is still another objection to this bill that should be fatal to it. It is this: From the time that this system of banking and currency was established down to the introduction of this bill, down to this hour, there has never been a proposition entertained by either branch of this Government to do anything that should possibly interfere with what I at least regard, and what I know many others regard, as the very key to the permanency of the system. This system of banking is not one by which the Government becomes a banker, as is sometimes thereof not by which the Government mediately at the sometimes the system. times charged, not by which the Government becomes it banker, as is sometimes charged, not by which the Government undertakes the responsibility of the circulation, or, in fact, the redemption of the circulation. The redemption of the circulation and the responsibility for its issue is placed, where it should be placed, upon those citizens who associate together and issue money, providing for its redemption through the Government itself.

Now, sir, the cardinal principle of that system has been that the banks should themselves redeem the currency; that they should never be a favored class; that they should never place themselves in such a relation to the country that it should be taxed for the purpose of redeeming their circulation. From the beginning to this hour they have been required to deposit with the Government a margin of at least 10 per cent, together with the 5 per cent. redemption fund, making 15 per cent. upon the par of the bonds; so that, in actual fact, the banks have always, through the Government, provided for the redemption of their bills and for every expenditure concerning it.

While that condition lasts this system may continue in profitableness and in usefulness to the country so long as the debt continues. But when that keystone is removed, when the people find that we are exposing this nation to taxation to maintain a fund in the Treasury of exposing this nation to taxation to maintain a fund in the Treasury of the United States with which to redeem in gold the bills that the banks shall issue, then this system will perish, and it ought to perish. I, sir, have certainly no unfriendliness to the national banks. To the suggestion of their plan and in the maturing of it I gave a quarter of a century ago as much reflection as I was able to give to any subject. I have watched the working of the system from that time to this, and in the benefits it has conferred upon the country it has not gone beyond what I anticipated. It will continue to confer those benefits. It will continue to propose the prosperity of the country so long as it remains the benefits it has conferred upon the country it has not gone beyond what I anticipated. It will continue to confer those benefits. It will continue to promote the prosperity of the country so long as it remains not a system of banking by the Government, but a system by which citizens, by associating themselves together and making the required deposit of national bonds, may, through the Government, issue a currency redeemable by their own money, their own deposits, in gold at all times. I beseech gentlemen, if they would preserve that system, if they would not, influenced by a temporary expediency, strike a deathblow to this financial system, not to pass this bill.

Look one moment at the actual facts. We are asked to authorize—to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to issue upon the 3 per cent. bonds notes to the full par value of the bonds. Now we are not yet six months removed from the time when, for at least one half month, in the greatest market in the world for these bonds, where the money of the country and of the Continent centers, these 3 per cent. bonds could not be sold at par; yet our money was not disturbed. Why was it not disturbed? Because every bill-holder as he looked at his bill and saw the quotation of the selling price of the bonds said, "Well, they can fall 10 per cent. more at least and still leave my money safe." So it was that through this great panic nobody, from the wealthiest to the humblest, neither the laborer nor the millionaire, no man, no matter how much he had to discharge or to receive, doubted for an instant that his money was good and equal to gold.

Pass this bill, and, when the next such crisis returns, that confidence will be gone, and gone forever. I do not believe that we can calculate upon such crises as being impossible or even improbable in the future, and if you pass this bill, when the next crisis arrives, at the very moment when we shall most need confidence and certainty in our money, we shall have instead a deep distrust, which will inevitably suspend specie pa very moment when we shall most need confidence and certainty in our money, we shall have instead a deep distrust, which will inevitably suspend specie payments throughout the country and bring upon us all the untold calamities which would result from such suspension.

I appeal to this House, as the guardians of the financial interests and financial safety of the country, not to remove this great safeguard for the mere purpose of enabling those who wish and expect to sell 4 per cent. bonds at a premium to realize that anticipation.

It is claimed on behalf of this bill that it will make the bank circula-

It is claimed on behalf of this bill that it will make the bank circula-It is claimed on behalf of this bill that it will make the bank circulation sufficiently profitable to induce its increase. I have made a most careful examination of that subject and of the probable effect of the bill in that respect, and the result is that in no place, in no locality, where interest is materially above 7 per cent. can circulation be taken out under this bill except at a loss. Where 8 per cent. prevails there will be certain loss in circulation under this bill. Possibly it may enable the holders of 4 per cent. bonds in the great markets to realize. It may induce others in those markets still to try their hands at the business and go into national banking; but beyond those great centers, at the very points from which the great body of the national currency now goes out, it not only affords no advantage, but it provides for nothing but positive and certain loss.

From a calculation carefully made upon this bill, it appears there is an absolute loss upon circulation where interest is 8 per cent. For the purpose of enabling those in the great centers who wish to realize the benefits of selling these bonds at the advance which this measure will cause, shall we in a great national system undertake to make this change which renders the issue of currency absolutely impossible without loss in every section where interest is worth 8 per cent.?

Mr. Speaker, I have prepared a bill which at the proper time I intend to offer as a substitute, by moving to recommit the pending bill with instructions to report the bill which I hold in my hand and which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to refund the bonded debt of the United States at 2½ per cent. interest, to reduce taxation upon circulating bank-note currency, and to secure such currency against unnecessary disturbance and fluctuation by applying the national revenues economically to payment of the national debt.

rency against unnecessary disturbance and fluctuation by applying the national revenues economically to payment of the national debt.

Be itenacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to receive at the Treasury any bonds of the United States bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent, per annum or 4½ per cent, per annum, and to issue in exchange therefor an equal amount of registered bonds of the United States of the denominations of fifty, one hundred, five hundred, one thousand, five thousand, ten thousand, and fifty thousand dollars, of such form as he may prescribe, and bearing interest at the rate of 2½ per cent, per annum, payable semi-annually at the Treasury of the United States. Said 2½ per cent, bonds to be issued in exchange for 4 per cent, bonds shall be payable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of July, 1907; said 2½ per cent, bonds to be issued in exchange for 4½ per cent, bonds shall be payable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of September, 1891.

Sec. 2. In the said exchange of 2½ per cent, bonds for 4 per cent, and 4½ per cent, bonds, provided always the moneys on hand and applicable are sufficient, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay such a sum in each case as shall be equal to the aggregate present worth of the quarter-yearly payments of interest from which the United States is released by such exchange, all interest in ascertaining said present worth being computed at the rate of 3 per cent, per annum, reinvested quarter yearly.

Sec. 3. All said 2½ per cent, bonds and the interest thereon shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes and duties of the United States and from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

Sec. 4. On and after date of the approval of this act the duty upon the circulating notes of mational banking associations shall be considered a deduction from the inter

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood the gentleman.

Mr. POTTER. I am simply giving notice that I shall offer it at the Mr. FOTTER. 1 and simply giving above the research proper time in the proper way.

Mr. WILKINS. Is it read as a part of the gentleman's remarks?

The SPEAKER. It is read in the gentleman's time.

Mr. BUCKNER. Has the gentleman from New York any estimate as to the amount of the draft upon the Treasury which there would be in making the exchange which his bill proposes?

Mr. POTTER. I shall explain that point if I am allowed time. Although I had supposed this proposition to be pretty clear upon its face, I desire to say a few words in explanation of it. As I have said, the difficulty of the situation is the great premium upon our present bonds, in connection with the fact that after two years we shall have no possible means by which we can apply the moneys of the Government to the payment of the debt except upon the terms which holders of the 4 per cent. bonds may themselves choose to grant.

Now, what is the plain and obvious method of doing away with the difficulties of this situation? There is a plain open way, which any private individual, any member of this House in his own affairs, would have entered upon without consulting committees, without taking advice from any source other than his own judgment. This premium represents what? It represents exactly, or very nearly, the interest upon these bonds in excess of the market rate of interest upon them today. The premium has been, as I have said, from 21 to 25 per cent. during the past year. If any one will take the pains to compute he will ascertain that this premium represents exactly the present worth of what the excess of interest above 2½ per cent. will amount to during twenty-two and one-half years. If the bonds were reduced now to the market rate of interest which supports these securities at par, does anybody doubt that they would remain at par or very nearly par?

Now, the bondholders throughout the length and breadth of this country have signified their willingness to have not the premium, but that portion of the public debt represented by this excess of interest above 2½ per cent. paid at its present worth at this time, or at the convenience of the Government at any time in the future, and thereafter to hold their securities at a rate of interest which will maintain them at par and no more. We can pay that portion of the public debt to every national-bank bondholder with about $34,000,000. Thirty-four million dollars is the present worth of this excess of interest above 2½ per cent., which maintains these bonds at 112 to 114 and 122 and 125 in the market. I repeat, the holders of these bonds have with single-per cent. gular unanimity expressed their willingness to receive this present worth. What will be the effect of paying it?

If it should extend, as I believe from the consultations I have been able to make with the ablest and best posted men in the country on this subject it will extend, not only to the national banks, but to the great body of the savings banks, and to a very large part, if not all, of the private holders, except where the bonds are held in trust, the result will be that during the next twenty-two years the whole body of our debt will remain at about par. We can then, after paying this installment will remain at about par. We can then, after paying this installment which we are now permitted to pay, proceed to pay the debt as we please; and one dollar in money will extinguish one dollar of the principal of the debt. By pursuing that course we shall save to this country in taxation many millions of dollars, and we shall relieve the nation from occupying the attitude of suppliants to the bondholders for the fifteen long years in which it may be engaged in paying the national debt. debt

Mr. BLOUNT. What would be the cost of the exchange of these

Mr. POTTER. The Secretary of the Treasury informs me that the cost of the whole exchange of the bonds will be but a few thousand dollars; a mere trifle. It is nothing but the printing of the bonds.

Mr. BLOUNT. I mean the cost of the exchange; the amount of money necessary to make the exchange.

Mr. POTTER. I have already stated approximately the amount of money necessary to refund all the bonds now deposited by the banks. To state it exactly, the amount is $34,383,400; and this is computed by the Treasurer's actuary and indorsed by the Secretary himself.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understood the gentleman to make an estimate of $250,000,000 before this.

Mr. POTTER. I am now speaking of the bonds deposited by the banks.

Mr. McMILLIN. There is another point in his bill which he offers as a substitute. It is known by law the Government is paying 41 per cent. interest on these bonds. Now, your bill provides that the interest, with the stipulations provided in the bill, shall be paid at present, or when presented by the bondholders, and in making that payment or in ascertaining what the present worth is you only give the Government the benefit of 3 per cent. interest. How does the gentleman explain?

Mr. POTTER. I will explain it. Two hundred and fifty million dollars of these bonds which mature September, 1891, bear 4½ per cent. They were issued when that was the market rate of interest for such bonds, and the lowest interest at which money could be obtained. With regard to the 4 per cent., the same remark can be made. Since that time the rate of interest has changed in the country, owing to the increased credit of the country, and owing perhaps to the accumulation of money in the country. The rate of interest has materially fallen, to so great an extent that by the statements monthly laid before us from the Treasury those who have consulted them will have seen the highest rate which now can be realized by the purchase of Government bonds is from 2.45 to about 2.68 per annum. That is, the Government can not invest its money so as to realize more than 2.45 to 2.68 on its in-westment, and this even in case of bonds not held by the banks.

When they are held by the banks the Government makes only $2\frac{1}{10}$, because the bonds return in taxes 1 per cent. upon the 90 per cent. issued on the bonds, and nine-tenths of 1 per cent. deducted from the 3 per cent. the Government pays on the bonds, leaves the actual receipt on any portion of the debt held by the banks which the Government can pay 2.10 per cent. interest. This bill provides that the Secretary may in his discretion and as fast as he finds it for the interest of the country and no faster—not in the discretion of the bondholders; not upon a demand of the bondholders; not until the money is in the Treasury, which he can not use as profitably in any other way—refund those bonds so as to make upon the money used in refunding 3 per cent. compound interest on the actual investment for the whole twenty-two years; a rate one-half per cent. higher than has been realized or can be realized now under the present law.

Mr. McMillin rose.

Mr. POTTER. Let me go on. I have placed a provision made by the Secretary of the Treasury on the circular letter I took the liberty the Secretary of the Treasury on the circular letter I took the heerly to send to members, showing also what would be the amount to be paid by the Government to enable it to realize 3½ per cent. instead of 3 per cent. upon the money used in refunding. I wish to say that a large part of these bonds are held in savings banks, some considerable part by private holders, and it can hardly be expected that savings banks or private holders would refund these bonds and give to the Government the same rate of interest the Government is paying them.

Mr. McMILLIN. The point I have made to the gentleman is that we pay to these parties 4½ per cent. interest, but only go back in the we pay to these parties $4\frac{\pi}{2}$ per cent. interest, but only go back in the proposed arrangement $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in discount.

Mr. POTTER. We must pay the bonds, principal and interest. Interest is as much a part of the debt as the principal. No difference can be made between the principal and the interest. The Government is under obligations to pay the whole debt, principal and interest, as the bond provides. But Government can not use its money in payment of its bonds so as to make over 2.10 per cent. in bank-held bonds, or in case of other bonds 2.45 per cent. to 2.68 per cent.

Government can not, like a private individual or a banker, loan out its funds at interest and thus realize a high rate. When its funds are accumulated in the Treasury in excess of the amount required for the current expenses of the Government, including all maturing obligations, this excess must either lie idle in the Treasury, abstracted and withdrawn from the currency and business of the country, earning no interest at all, or must be applied to payment of that portion of the public debt now due and payable, or to purchase of Government obligations not yet due. In no other way than one of these can the surplus in the Treasury be applied to extinguishment of the public debt. By a moment's reflection the honorable member from Tennessee [Mr. McMII-LIN] can not fail to see that in purchasing the obligations of Government before maturity we must pay the market price of them, the price which they command in market. To ask the holders to surrender them to Government at less than their market price would be to ask them to give to Government a part of their present value without considera-tion. I do not think the honorable gentleman would advise a holder of these bonds, whether a savings bank holding them in trust for its depositors, or any other holder, that the bonds ought to be surrendered positors, or any other holder, that the bonds ought to be surrendered to Government for any price less than their market price at the date of surrender, or its equivalent to the holder, nor can he conclude that the Government will be wronged by taking up these 4 per cent. bonds by an exchange for $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. bonds and the present payment of such sum as will realize to the holders the present market value of the 4 per cent. bonds, provided Government gains by such exchange great and manifest advantages to the country.

I desire now to call the attention of the House to some of the advant-

I desire now to call the attention of the House to some of the advantages which will be secured to the country by passage of this substitute bill. The bill gives greater freedom to the Secretary of the Treasury than he now has in payment of the public debt by relieving him from the necessity of applying surplus funds only to payment of bonds now payable at pleasure of Government when such application would injuriously disturb or contract the currency and endanger the business and prosperity of the country, and enabling him to apply such surplus either to the purchase of bonds not due or to refunding the debt into $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. bonds or the payment of bonds now payable at the pleasure of Government as the payment of bonds now payable at the pleasure of Government, as the payment of bonds now payable at the pleasure of Government, as the interest of the country may require. Under the present law the surplus is applicable only to the payment of bonds due, and payable at the pleasure of Government. Of such bonds uncalled for payment there are but \$184,190,500 all bearing 3 per cent. interest, of which \$146,018,200 are held by national banks and deposited to secure national-bank circulation, and \$38,172,300 by other holders.

By payment of these bonds deposited to secure circulation Government.

ment saves but 2.1 per cent. interest after deducting the tax received from the circulation secured by the same bonds. Payment of these bank-held bonds destroys the security for the bank notes to the amount of 90 per cent. of the bonds and contracts the bank-note circulation to the same amount, unless others bonds are purchased and deposited in place of the bonds paid. The only other bonds available for this purpose, not liable to immediate payment, are the 4 per cent. and 4½ per cent. bonds, which now bear so high premium that they can not safely and profitably be purchased by banks for this purpose. Payment, thereand prontably be purchased by banks for this purpose. Payment, therefore, of the 3 per cent. bonds held by banks and now payable causes contraction of the currency and operates to discourage and paralyze business. If Government now had the option to pay other bonds at an equal or greater saving of interest than can be made by paying those held to secure the currency, and thus avoid disturbance and contraction of the currency, it can not be doubted it would be its interest and duty to pay such other bonds before paying those held to secure the currency.

This substitute bill provides such an option without injustice to any class of bondholders, and at the same time enables Government to realize a greater saving by .9 per cent. annually upon the amount applied to payment of the debt than can be realized by paying the bonds held to secure the currency. It also provides (section 5) that when greater saving to the country can be made by purchasing bonds not yet due than by payment of bonds due and payable at Government option, this may be done. This freedom of choice and action thus secured to the Secretary of the Treasury will enable him to protect the Government against corners by holders of Government bonds, and also enable that officer to go steadily forward in payment of the debt without the slightest disturbance to the curreney, and in such way that this payment will constantly promote and invigorate the business of the country.

This bill, therefore, promotes and facilitates payment of the debtin-stead of postponing it. Under its operation the debt will be paid with less money and less taxation by very many millions than under the present law. Payment will proceed as fast as the surplus funds in the Treasury thus applicable warrant, and entirely at the convenience and under control of Government. By payment of this small installment—the present worth of the excessive interest now—all the funds will be reduced to par, and will continue at or near par during their entire payment. Each dollar applied to the public debt will extinguish a dollar of the debt, and the country will be no longer at the mercy of the bondholders in applying the surplus to payment of the debt.

Perhaps the greatest and most immediate advantage to the country Perhaps the greatest and most immediate advantage to the country from the passage of this bill will be the prompt and permanent restoration of confidence and certainty in its currency and business. By its passage every business man in the country will be made certain that the currency can not be capriciously or unduly contracted during the next twenty-two and one-half years, and that it will at all times be equal to gold. This is precisely the confidence which is necessary to, and must precede, the general and permanent restoration of prosperity throughout the country. With this confidence restored and based upon the sure foundation of a stable and sufficient currency, at all times and under all circumstances equal to gold, capital will no longer remain timid and idle, and labor no longer remain unemployed. An era of prosperity and healthy activity and progress will commence, which should have, and under wise legislation in these halls will have, no check for the next twenty-two and one-half years.

the next twenty-two and one-half years.

During this time coin will be largely accumulated in the country, and it will be the duty of those who shall then occupy the places which we now occupy to determine whether the interests of the country rewe now occupy to determine whether the interests of the country require that any portion of the currency shall longer rest upon the national credit. For one I am content to discharge my own duty in my own day, and to leave to those upon whom responsibility may then be placed to determine what the interests of the country may require placed to determine what the interests of the country may require twenty-two years hence. I know that if this bill passes my country will be paying a lower interest upon its debt than is paid by any other civilized country in the world; that upon the bonds of the nation securing this debt, which can at all times be purchased at or near par, citizens can always supply themselves with a currency sufficient for the advancing commerce, enterprise, and development of the country, everywhere of the same value and everywhere equal to gold within the boundary. where of the same value and everywhere equal to gold within the boundaries of the Republic or the field of its commerce. And with this I am content, without anticipating the duties of another generation.

I can not close without reminding the House that the opportunity now offered may never again occur. There is no one who has examined the subject who can doubt that our debt may now be refunded at 2½ per cent., and by the same act the stability and sufficiency of the currency, equal always and everywhere to gold, be secured and made certain for the next twenty-two and a half years.

I appeal to the members on this floor, and ask whether the petitions and letters from all parts of the country from the business men and commercial bodies do not attest this. This is no plan to promote the interest of banks. I have never had an interest in a bank in my life. This bill seeks only to secure and make certain the stability and sufficiency of the currency for the next twenty-two and a half years while we pay the remainder of the debt. By passing it now we can restore confidence and prosperity to the country, and make certain that the currency cannot be injuriously contracted, but will be at all times adequate to the advancing wants of business and at all times redeemable in gold, not with the funds of the Government, provided through taxation, but with the funds of the banks themselves deposited with and held by the Government, in the 10 per cent. margin now sought by this Senate bill to be withdrawn and destroyed.

Let this be done and Government assume this burden of redeeming the bills of the banks, and these institutions and those interested in them will no longer ask that the interest upon the national debt be reduced Government will then be left to its only remaining resources for maintaining the bonds always at par in gold—the payment of an interest high enough at all times to secure this, and a sufficient fund in the Treasury, provided and maintained through taxation of the people, to redeem the bills of the banks at all times and in all conditions of the funances and business of the country.

Our national banking system now unites the interests of the banks at all times and under all circumstances with the Government in the necessity to keep the national bonds above par. At its origin near twenty-four years ago, in trging its adoption upon Secretary Chase, I said:

It makes it for the direct interest of every bank and banker to keep the United States stocks above par. It also puts upon the banks, and not upon the Government, the redemption of the circulation, the Government only acting as trustee in selling the deposited stocks in case the bank fails to redeem.

This responsibility and interest ought never to be removed from those issuing national-bank notes upon the bonds of the nation, and can not be without destroying the keystone by which the banks of the country are made at all times to seek their own security and prosperity by supporting the credit of the country, upon which they and their business rest for their foundation.

Fortunately, banks, bankers, and business men throughout the country are now all united in the necessity of keeping high and uppermost the national credit. They are therefore now unanimous and earnest in favor of refunding the debt in $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. bonds. While this situation continues Congress is master of it, and may secure the prossituation continues Congress is master of it, and may secure the prosperity of the country—so far as stability and sufficiency of a currency at all times equal to gold can secure this—by the passage of this refunding bill and with the aid and acquiescence of all the bankers and business men of the country. This is the day of our opportunity. We can not let it pass unimproved without grave responsibilities to the country with whose interests we are now charged.

If it passes unimproved, other schemes like the one before us for promoting the interests of bondholders without regard to the interests of the country and endangering if not destroying the redeemability of the country, and endangering if not destroying the redeemability of a bank-note currency in gold, will be pressed for enactment into law at our hands, and the opportunity of to-day may never again return. It certainly will never again return if the bill now before us—the Mc-Pherson bill—or any bill accomplishing the same objects which it will accomplish shall be passed.

I will print in connection with my remarks some tables illustrating these two bills and their operation.

SPEECH

HON. JAMES M. RIGGS. OF ILLINOIS.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 3, 1885,

On the bill (S. 2530) to authorize an additional appointment on the retired-list of the Army.

Mr. RIGGS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: As I voted against a Senate bill a few days ago which provided specifically for the retirement of General Grant, and propose now to vote for the bill under consideration, I desire to say a few words, not by way of apology or excuse for the vote I propose to give on this occasion, but to explain a position which, unless rightly understood,

The bill against which I voted so recently mentioned General Grant by name and provided for placing him on the retired-list of the Army. It was similar in structure to the bill passed last year for the retirement of General Porter, which was vetoed by the President, and was subject to at least some of the most serious objections which the Executive presented in his veto message on that occasion. To have passed that bill and sent it to the President for his signature could, in my judgment, have done no good. It might have compelled President Arthur to have stood apparently in the attitude of refusing to sign a bill to retire General Grant; but why should any one desire to do that? No good result could come from it. The fact that the bill was subject to such objections and could not receive the President's approval was a sufficient reason for voting against it.

The bill now under consideration has not those objectionable features, and if passed will no doubt receive the approval of the President, and while it does not name General Grant, but only provides "that the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint on the retired-list of the Army of the United States, from among those who have been generals commanding the armies of the United States or Generals-in-Chief of said Army, one person; and the total number now allowed by law to compose said retired-list shall be, on such appointment, increased accordingly," yet no one doubts that the President will, if it be passed, sign it, and, under its provisions, appoint General Grant; and no one can doubt that the Senate will give its consent to such appointment.

In fact, those who oppose the bill do so on the ground that General Grant will be the appointee under it if passed, while, as they insist, no such provision should be made for him. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Stock-SLAGER] in their remarks have urged against this bill that its passage will be bad policy; and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Stock-SLAGER] The bill now under consideration has not those objectionable feat-will be bad policy; and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCK-

SLAGER] says:

I amopposed to building up in this country the English system of civil pensions. England has to-day a civil pension-list of over $20,000,000. We are going rapidly in the same direction, and for one I enter my solemn protest against it.

I suppose we are all opposed to building up the English system in this country. But can we not pass the pending bill and permit General Grant to be placed on the retired-list without establishing the English system? Can we not trust ourselves?

If we can not, then our constituents ought not to trust us.

It is not proposed by any one to place General Grant on the retired-list for any service he has rendered the Government in a civil capacity. I am opposed to him in politics—have always been opposed to him; and had he been nothing more than twice President of the United States I would never vote to make any such provision for him as is now States I would never vote to make any such provision for him as is now proposed. But he has been more, much more, than twice President.

Throughout the civilized world he is recognized as the chief military representative of this country. As a military man he is singularly esteemed by other nations. He is now in feeble health, and no doubt has but a short time to live. Under the circumstances is it wrong to do him the honor and the good now proposed? I think not. I believe my constituents will approve my action in voting for this bill. I believe nine-tenths of the American people will approve its passage. I believe the Congress and the people of this country can trust themselves to do this for the acknowledged military representative of our great Government without incurring the danger of building up an expensive, useless, and vicious civil-pension list, such as has been menpensive, useless, and vicious civil-pension list, such as has been mentioned. I want to make a record here, so far as I am personally con-

I will not vote for this bill because of anything General Grant did while President. He did much during that period which never did, and I presume never will, meet my approval. I will vote for it because he bore a most conspicuous and most honorable part in that great military struggle which determined whether the Government of our fathers should continue to exist in its entirety. I may be wrong, but if I am to err I prefer that the error shall be upon the side of generosity and good feeling.

One thing more and I will have said all I want to say. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] has said:

It has not been demonstrated to this House that General Grant is in actual need of this relief. There is no proof of that fact, while there are tens of thousands of men who served their country who are at this very hour in distress and in sore need of relief, and the pension of this Congress had better be given to them than to one who already has a sufficient income. When they have been relieved it will be time enough to relieve General Grant and others who are not in distress.

All that may be true. I have never understood that we pay pensions simply because the recipients are in distress. Our pension system was not devised for the mere purpose of dispensing governmental charity. Its object is to pay to those who serve their country in the military or naval service what they ought to have.

I admit there are many of the Union soldiers of the late war who are needy, but will a refusal to pass this bill benefit them? The only way to benefit them is to pass this bill benefit them? The only way to benefit them is to pass the legislation necessary to guarantee to them what they ought to have. I believe our pension laws ought to be amended, but refusing to pass the bill now under consideration will not amend them. This Government is able to do for General Grant what is proposed by this bill, and have enough left to pay pensions to all soldiers who ought to have them. Let both be done.

A genuine Government Postal Telegraph—A brief statement of some proceedings in the attempt to obtain the desired legislation—A comparison of plans, and a commendation of the true

SPEECH

HON. CHARLES A. SUMNER,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 28, 1885.

On the bill (H. R. 8256) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

Mr. SUMNER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: In this act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, it is provided, on page 64, that for telegraphic reports and messages over commercial lines and for the rent of leased lines $136,000 are appropriated; and scattered through the bill are provisions for the payment for telegraphing, among other items named under the different headings of the measure. This necessarily, without recourse to the extreme margin of license sometimes reached in the discussion of appropriation bills, gives opportunity for, if it does not invite, discussion on the subject of a genuine postal telegraph. telegraph.

And, incidentally, advantage may be taken of this occasion to refer to some small criticism that has been made because of an amendment proposed and adopted in the House when the Army bill was under consideration. If the amendment referred to was unnecessary or out of place, then the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, by the insertion of some of the items to which I have referred, has been in error by unnecessary provisions for expenditures on telegraph account. But it has not been in error, and the criticism alluded to was account. But it has not been in error, and the criticism anuded to was as baseless as it was otherwise contemptible.

Here is an appropriation of $136,000, in payment for telegraphic reports and messages over commercial lines and for the rent of leased lines of telegraph, in the Signal Service of the United States. The actual value of the services thus provided for, the cost price to the telegraph companies, is far less than the aggregate of the appropriation (the Government regime more than it did thirteen years agg); but upon that ernment paying more than it did thirteen years ago); but upon that subject it is not my purpose at present to dwell. That is an insignificant matter compared with the main proposition which is legitimately brought up for consideration at this time. If we are to continue to pay for services performed absolutely by third parties, when they should be rendered directly by the Government to itself, we may expect that extortion will be characteristic of the transaction.

A part of the functions of this Government as laid down in the organic law is the carrying of the mail for the inhabitants of the nation. The reasons which justified that provision of the Constitution on which The reasons which justified that provision of the Constitution on which I have already dwelt in connection with this subject—whereby the "transmission of intelligence" among the people was assumed as a Federal Government duty by our fathers—need not be recapitulated here; but for some of them I beg the present hearer or the future reader of my remarks to refer to a speech delivered by me on the subject of postal telegraphy at the former session of this Congress. The reasons of policy why the Congress of the United States should not fail to do its bounden duty and provide for a genuine Government postal telegraph are growing in importance and multiplying in number every year. And yet this Forty-eighth Congress is about to close without legislation upon this subject.

After earnest and strenuous efforts made from the very beginning of this term in behalf of the great, legitimate, and constitutional Government enterprise referred to, it may be worth while to inquire whether any progress whatever has been made touching this matter; what efforts have been made; what has been the character of such endeavors. Having regard to the circumstances, has there been progress by way of enlightenment in or out of Congress? Has the information imparted been manifestly or demonstrably adapted to and calculated for an advance in the struggle for emancipation and for popular rights and privileges in the premises?

Let us take a hasty and necessarily a superficial glance at a portion of the record.

On the first day for the introduction of bills, in the first session of this Congress, I presented for the consideration of Congress and the country the measure which I will place in the appendix to my remarks on this occasion. [See Appendix A.] It will be seen that whatever may have been its defects of detail it unquestionably provided for a complete network of telegraph lines to be constructed and owned and operated by the General Government, touching every post-office in the country south of the northernmost boundary of Washington Territory—every post-office situated in a town of four hundred inhabitants or more; and there was added the privilege and authority for the Postmaster-General to extend lines to post-offices in smaller villages along the routes, while provision was made for inquiry and preparatory work toward the construction of a cable line to our Alaska possessions. By the language of the bill work was to begin as nearly simultaneously as possible at the thirty-two different points named, and prosecuted with all possible distants. patch. In the homely language of the market, it was undeniably a measure that "meant business." In a recent speech, January 29, 1885, by Hon. William Roche, before the members of the house of representatives of the Ohio Legislature, it has been characterized as "the only genuine postal telegraph bill ever presented to Congress." Mr. Roche is and for many years has been a practical telegrapher.

What was the situation when this bill was introduced? There is no time to enumerate all the difficulties or the obstacles that were confronted by those who advocated a postal telegraph act at such a time, but some of the hindrances to the favorable consideration ought to be set down, reviewed, and remembered.

As usual, the proposition for a postal telegraph was denounced and opposed in every way not only by the agents and emissaries but also by the highest officers of the Western Union Telegraph Company. It may be said that the officers were invited to put in an appearance on the occasion. Be it so. Let the forms stand as they may on the minutes. We all know perfectly well that with or without invitation they were here with their appliances to object and obstruct, and if possible defeat.

There was the usual laugh of the lobby, echoed and articulated in local and metropolitan dailies, but it must be confessed that there was not so much insolence at the beginning as has been witnessed on similar occawhen insolence at the beginning as has been withessed of similar occasions at other Congresses. I remember, sir, when a president of the Western Union Telegraph Company actually sat in the chairman's seat of a committee of the House of Representatives and began the questioning of witnesses who had been by some means summoned to disclose facts touching the arrogance and extortions and outrages of a general character in connection with Associated Press dispatches—reversing the order of the courts, and cross-examining the person summoned at the very outset! Still, atour first session, last year, there was reliance upon this method for preventing fair and candid and earnest consideration. There was the guffaw of the official and his counselors and carriers.

What was my bill? How does it read as a financial proposition? "Why, it is ridiculous"—so it was said. The first speeches of the lobbyists and other agents who were brought here to attack every proposition relation to a postal telegraph were deriving. A nybody who han sition relating to a postal telegraph were derisive. Anybody who happened to be elected to Congress could introduce a bill. That was an easy operation. And silly men might be expected to present foolish propositions. And bill No. 98, introduced by the member from California, was of this order. So it was said. In what respect was it of

The idea of constructing a Government postal telegraph connecting the post-offices of the United States as before enumerated, at a total expenditure of $25,000,000! How absurd! Why, the Western Union Telegraph lines were said to be worth $120,000,000. Gentlemen who sit about me, honorable and intelligent Representatives, for whom my respect has deepened with every hour of communion, who were not and who did not affect to be closely informed upon the subject, reported to me these words of criticism, and I might say of contempt, with an inquiring inflection; with the question often plainly asked as to whether it was possible that a construction could be had for such a sum as I had provided, or that I could be guilty of submitting a plan and an estimate of cost that was so wholly impracticable, as was alleged by the talk of the gentlemen of the corridors and the reading-rooms of the hotels and the considered? It is a challenge! That is what the Representative of intelligence and purpose having in hand such a subject does intend it to be, in the most militant sense.

Has there been no progress? Here was the general report—circulated these many years—to the effect that the Western Union Telegraph property with all its franchises and patents was worth $120,000,000. I said that for $25,000,000 you could build telegraph lines connecting every post-office where there were four hundred inhabitants or more, and sup ply with the necessary instruments and furniture strictly pertaining to the business of carrying the letters of the people by lightning. The appalling sum of the Western Union Telegraph Company at first was $120,-000,000. But when the inquiry came into the committee-room at the other end of the Capitol, the unrecorded babble from the officials of the great monopoly fixed the value of the lines at not less than $100,000, 000—a slight reduction for round numbers' sake? And so the report went into some of the newspapers of the country. My bill implied the declaration on my part that $25,000,000 would more than duplicate the Western Union lines. When the statements came to be made in form, uttered for record by the reporter, the estimate was $80,000,000 to $90,-000,000. 000,000. My bill was a challenge. I said that the absurdity was on the other side; that it was ridiculous to claim any such valuation. There was much of rising emphasis in these statements, and for the Western Union monopoly officers and agents it appears that the reiteration was tantalizing.

The inquiry at first was almost entirely confined to the Senate committee. The officers of the great monopoly and their immediate agents could hardly condescend to come to this end of the Capitol. But the investigation was going on here, and there was a little publicity gained for it. It became necessary, it would appear, that some notice should be taken of the challenge and the accompanying assertions made in the southern wing of the Capitol with reference to this matter. And right at this point let the importance of the statement of enormous cost be fully and explicitly understood.

Whenever the subject has been broached before a public audience during the last twenty years it has been said at the time by some honest listeners, or subsequently stated in the columns of some venal sheet published in the neighborhood, that it was reported that a Government postal telegraph would cost the nation over $100,000,000, and that a proportionate expenditure year by year would be required for maintenance and extension. Thousands upon tens of thousands of good people have had their minds closed at once to any consideration of this subject by this very statement. Such was the intention and effect of the original proclamation of cost—which the unsophisticated readers had been led to believe and the corrupt papers had been hired to repeat.

But it became necessary to take a little notice of the agitation that had been stirred up at this end of the Capitol of the nation. So an agent of the monopoly came over, and among other things graciously informed us at an open meeting of a committee that the Western Union Telegraph lines were worth from $70,000,000 to $80,000,000. A few days thereafter I received a letter from Hon. Gardiner G. Hubbard, informing me that a subcommittee of the House Committee on Post-Offices would hear him on the postal telegraph on the following morning at half past 10, and adding that he would be pleased if I would be present and ask any questions which I might desire to propound in the course of his remarks. This able and courteous gentleman has been for many years an advocate of a system of postal telegraphy known as the contract system; at first proposing to organize a company for the purpose of taking the contract. Mr. Hubbard has never disguised his plans or purpose in any respect, and he has plainly said that he and his associates could make money on a contract such as he has suggested with greatly reduced rates as compared with the tariff in existence at the time when he submitted his propositions. This personal statement is, of course, somewhat to one side, and is uttered because I do not wish to be placed in a false position with reference to this distinguished gentleman, for m a false position with reference to this distinguished gentleman, for whom I have the highest personal respect.

Now, Mr. Hubbard has been studying this subject in America and Europe for many years. He is justly proud of his inquiries in this consideration and of the efforts which he has made, legitimately and honorably, in and around the Halls of Congress, with reference to this matter. And, therefore, it was with unusual and (as it appeared to me) with a severe emphasis that on the occasion to which I refer to wit, on the 1st day of April, 1884—he said before the subcommittee of the Post-Office Committee of this House that the Western Union Telethe Post-Office Committee of this House that the Western Union Telegraph lines could not be duplicated for less than $60,000,000. My sole question on that occasion was for a repetition of that statement on his part, that there might be no mistake as to what he said. He repeated the statement. And it was not strange to observe that it was immediately followed by an exclamation from some one in that open cham--an honorable member of the House Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads—to the effect that then the stock of the company was "not so very much watered after all."

But my challenge remained in House bill No. 98. And thereafter in other forms I distinctly reiterated it; thereby confronting so able and intelligent a gentleman and so respected a personal friend as Mr. Hubbard. Even Mr. Hubbard had been grossly deceived. But it will transpire that I put him upon fresh inquiry.

Has there been any progress? I can go no further into detail in this branch of inquiry, and hasten to the conclusion. Within a few weeks after the date last named, Mr. Hubbard placed himself upon record before a Senate committee on post-offices as declaring that the Western Union lines were worth about $43,000,000; and that many would doubtless believe, and say, that his estimate was as much too high as others would contend that it was too low. All the time my challenge bill said $25,000,000. And we have now come down from $120,000,000 to $43,-000,000—a paring down of $77,000,000.

Finally, a little over one month before the adjournment of Congress, a report comes from the Senate committee, in which we are informed that the Western Union lines are not worth above $30,220,965—a reduction of $90,000,000. Has there been any progress in practical enlightenment? (See page 6, report of Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, May 27, 1884.)

Mr. Chairman, the telegraph lines owned by the Western Union Telegraph Company are not worth $12,000,000. I intended, if I had had opportunity upon this floor at the last session, after the report from the subcommittee on postal telegraphy, to demonstrate that the wires, poles, insulators, and instruments belonging to that company could be duplicated for less than $15,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, a new member upon the floor of this House labors under great disadvantages, few of which are known to the general public, and none of which are fully estimated until experience has taught the lesson. The limitations of the rules are sometimes iniquitous; but the customs which no rules can at once do away with, and with reference to which we have hardly a right to complain, are of such a character as to forbid that frequent entrance upon debate which a gentleman endowed with an ordinary amount of modesty can only afford to do and maintain his self-respect after having established large relations of personal acquaintanceship. It is not a question of courage on the one hand, and I might say that it is not a question having in it much of the element of courtesy on the other. It is difficult to obtain recognition, not only here but before committees, when you are almost absolutely a stranger in a strange council; and hence I have to apologize for or explain with respect to my failure to speak out more freely here and elsewhere in formal manner on these and kindred subjects.

Under all the circumstances, I return in the circle of contemplation and retrospect with some sentiments of cheer over what has been accomplished

There has been progress; at least the people of this country now know that the lines of the Western Union Telegraph Company are not worth $120,000,000, nor yet one-fourth of that amount.

And hundreds of thousands of our fellow-citizens know that the challenge has been made, which involves the assertion here that for less than $25,000,000 you can link every post-office south of the northernmost boundary of Washington Territory, and not representing over four hundred inhabitants, with the telegraphic wires, adequate to carry the letters of the people that are or will be ready for such transmission by a genuine Government postal telegraph at a reasonable charge.

Writes Charles E. Buell, one of the most experienced telegraph-line managers and instrument makers in this country, in a letter to me from Springfield, Mass., dated February 18, 1885:

It would be of the greatest advantage to the Government and the people at large if an investigation could be made in Congress that would show the working conditions of the lines of all telegraph companies and their relations and contracts with railway and other corporations. In the first instance, the testimony of the officials and employée of the Western Union Telegraph Company would show that their lines are so dilapidated as to be worthless, and but for contracts with other companies could not deliver messages over long stretches.

And again, under later date, Mr. Buell says:

It is believed that the entire property of the Western Union Telegraph Company could be shown to be worth not much, if any, over $10,000,000; and to pay dividends on their vast capital not only labor but the property is being sacrificed.

Observe that in this-last quoted remark Mr. Buell, who is an authority on all such matters, refers deprecatingly to the outrageous wage-reduction, to which I shall hereafter more particularly refer.

But if my estimate of cost was "absurd," how much more ridiculous was the proposition to be found in House bill No. 98, which I introduced on the first bill day of last session, for a uniform rate through-out the Republic of ten words for 10 cents? Yet we had not proceeded very far in the inquiries instituted during the last session before the confession was made on the part of the Western Union Telegraph Company officials that in the event of a reduction of tariff to a maximum sum much larger than the one I had named, there soon would be a patronage amounting to 100,000,000 dispatches every year. On this I hastened to place the Simple Simon multiplication of tens—in a speech before a subcommittee of the House Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads-and to the astonishment of the great monopoly calculators the result was a gross income in one year of nearly one-half the amount reresult was a gross income in one year of hearly one-hair the amount required for the construction of the all-connecting system of lines. (See my speech before House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, March 25, 1884.) Thereupon, immediately after having declared that Government competition would necessarily and inevitably be ruinously absorbing in its grasp of public patronage, there was the low-voiced response about the competition of private lines. But if the private lines could not live or pay dividends to-day, with their monopoly, at the figures proposed in the Senate bill, which are from 50 per cent, to five times as much as those proposed in my bill, how shall they live and compete with the Government and its uniform 10-cent rate throughout the country? Answer me that.

Mr. Chairman, there never was such cheatery in public declamation

Mr. Chairman, there never was such cheatery in public declamation of the American people on any subject presented for the consideration of the American people and their Representatives as there has been with respect to telegraphy. The nine hundred and ninety-nine out of 1,000 citizens who have no special information on this subject (and this is no impeachment of their character for general intelligence) have been led to believe, for instance, that the cost of a local battery was $5 a day, when the expense for that time did not reach as many cents. And so far as possible the actual cost of everything connected with the business has been covered up, or has been magnified; and this has been done in conjunction with the systematic suppression of all information touching individual or organized efforts to bring about a reform with respect to telegraph management. These efforts for concealment and misrepresentation have largely contributed to keep the majority of our people in the belief that we are well served and judiciously and economically provided for by the telegraph monopoly of the land.

Has there been progress? I remember when first in my adopted and beloved State I began to agitate this question by the delivery of public lectures upon the subject, that I was surprised myself, even after what I had learned in private conversations, on discovering the lack of correct or exact information among the people on this subject. And so was I induced more and more to make such lecturing a part of my missionary service—a service by the way in which I intend to continue so long as I shall have strength of body and of mind and occasional opportunity for such public and patriotic service amid the exactions of a laborious professional life. For I regard the proposition for a genuine Government postal telegraph as the main question of importance before the people of this country; and I have become more and more convinced during the last twenty years of its due pre-eminence as a topic for popular and Congressional consideration.

Stop a moment to think—and when you are about to send a dispatch by telegraph or are writing a letter for which you anxiously wish the speediest delivery, give pause to reflect—about the advantage of an uniform rate of ten cents for ten words between all stations in this Republic. How much of your present mail correspondence could then go by lightning? What benefit, what satisfaction in such daily communications! How the pangs of partings would be assuaged! How the ties of friendships could be maintained and strengthened! What thousand and one misunderstandings would be prevented? What thousand and one misunderstandings would be prevented or corrected! And in business, how vast and incalculable the advantages to the common people! Well, your Government could and should give you this cheap method of intercommunication. O, citizens of the United States, your Government can do this and make a profit from the enterprise. Will Senators and Representatives be instructed accordingly within the next

Ah! but you would interfere with a legitimate private enterprise, and by governmental interference you would "rob the widows and orphans" who have stock in the Western Union Telegraph Company. In this kind of speech the agents of Jay Gould and company did not fail to largely indulge before the committees at the last session. And as their drivel in this vein is in print, there can be no question of propriety in regard to referring to it. It is not shielded from answering or contemptuous notice by the "etiquette of committee confidence." Nay, it is a matter of monopoly newspaper appeal. Talk of that which is despicable in the way of statement or argument! I decline to repeat obvious replies to such appeals. But where do they come from? They come from men who have reduced the wages of the laborers in their employ to the point of poverty. They have within the past few years cut down from $100 a month to $56 a month as an average for operators upon their lines. How many poor widows and orphans have been pinched by the outrageous and grinding tyranny of wage-reduction that has been practiced against the worthy people by whose skill the telegraphic dispatches of the day are transmitted!

And in the same breath—for these things push in with the force of a flood—let it not be forgotten that it has even been a matter of boast, a flood—let it not be forgotten that it has even been a matter of boast, sometimes uttered above a whisper, that the work of the monopoly was more cheaply performed, so far as the operators and line-men were concerned, than it would have been, or would be, under direct Government postal telegraph management. And you are actually invited to maintain for your telegraphic intercommunication this monopoly because the corporation can exact from your citizens the severest toil requisite in the business for a sum far less than that which any administration of Federal Government would have the conscience to fix.

Has there been progress? Looking at the bills reported from the committees—bills for a contract by the Government for telegraphic service—we may reply both "Yes" and "No." Any reports bringing the subject up directly for discussion might be hailed as a sign of progress. We will glance at something of their origin and history. And in order to do so we must step back a little in the record of events.

I intended before arriving at this stage of my remarks to have drawn attention to the fact that whereas it had been stated in 1883 by the officers of the telegraph monopoly, or some of them, that it was impossible to reduce the then existing tariff of charges for telegraphic transmission without bringing financial disaster upon the corporation, as soon as it was ascertained that there was to be an active and earnest effort for Government postal telegraph at the first session of this Congress the tariff was reduced; and shortly afterward it was announced that profits and dividends would not be less on this account. The charge for a message across the continent was reduced from $1.50 to $1, although an appeal for such reduction between the shores had been met by the telegraph officers, a short time prior to the reduction, with declarations about the "absolute impoverishment" that would ensue upon

Here is testimony of a double consequence—having, in fact, three bearings. First, testimony to the fact that high telegraphic rates are kept up to prevent a certain class of people from using the telegraph lines for commercial purposes, in order that the telegraph monopoly may play with the markets of the country and the world. Second, here is testimony establishing either the ignorance or the unscrupulous character of the men of business who, being related to the monopoly as officers, undertake to say that a reduction will prove disastrous, when experience was ample to show them, and did past all question demonstrate to a candid judgment, that a reduction would result in no loss, if it did not produce additional gain. Third, there was testimony to the value of agitation on this subject, and agitation in the only form that is effective as against these monopolists—directed toward and existing in or about to exist in the Congress of the United States

The first overland telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean was constructed with money given by the General and by State Governments. The profits in the very first year after its construction amounted to as much as the original cost of the line. This much in passing.

It having been ascertained that great and unusually favorable interest had been aroused in the two Houses of Congress with respect to the proposition for a genuine postal telegraph, it became necessary that the proposition for a genuine postal telegraph, it became necessary that there should be a diversion. Or, if you please, outside of the old monopoly were persons of wealth who had observed or ascertained something with respect to the enormous profits connected with the telegraphic business, and who had been watching for an opportunity to lift up their little temporarily competing telegraphic enterprise into such formidable proportions as would enable them to call for a partnership, open or secret, with the Jay Gould corporation.

There may be some latitude of speculation as to the exact status of parties who now put in an appearance before the Legislature of the nation with a proposition for a contract—a so-called postal telegraph contract. Be that as it may, the inquiry, the investigation having for its object and outcome a genuine postal telegraph had reached such a point, had acquired such a momentum, that it was either considered dangerous by the existing great monopoly, and so demanded catching or counter propositions, or it was believed to be at a proper flood-tide for the little but rising rival speculators, when there appears in the literature of this subject what is known as the Johnny Mackay contract-job bill.

Now, I have not time to fully discuss the character of that measure, and to show as fully and unanswerably as I can that a contract-job postal telegraph—"postal telegraph," so called—would be of comparatively little advantage as compared with, or over and above, existing accommodations, and arrangements that are certain of existence in the future without governmental action in the premises. I must principally con-fine myself now to the history of the interjected scheme, and often leave my respected hearers to draw their own particular inferences as to origin, motives, &c., as the narrative proceeds, or as they do me the honor to

The committees, and especially the members of the subcommittees, of the two Houses were apparently favorably impressed, as some of the individual members for years had been, with the project for a genuine postal telegraph. Now, then, who comes upon the scene? My personal knowledge of these particulars is of course mainly restricted to what occurred at this end of the Capitol.

There is produced a bill providing for a contract with the Johnny Mackay Cable and Postal Telegraph Company. It is brought here by none other than two persons formerly residents upon the Pacific coast, both of whom had long ago acquired an aromatic reputation as lobby-ists and manipulators of Legislatures. In the room of one of these persons, whose character and reputation is clearly shadowed forth in what is known as the Huntington-Colton correspondence, this Johnny Mackay bill is first read by a distinguished and honored Representative, who is then and there advised that a genuine postal-telegraph system means "centralization;" and that this contract-job text presents the proper plan for legislation. The bill is brought into the committee-room not by the usual methods of introduction. And not until it has been partly considered by sections in committee, a consideration not theretofore accorded to some of the postal-telegraph bills that had been regularly introduced into this House, was it offered here and referred; a manifest attempt to impose upon the honorable gentlemen of the committee, who in their integrity and their simplicity it was probably hoped might possibly be betrayed into a sudden favorable report in behalf of the iniquitous lobby measure, the real character of which these honor-able gentlemen did not at first for a moment suspect.

When Mr. Hubbard and associates came asking for a national charter and a contract, in years gone by, they said that they expected to make a profit from franchise and operations. But Johnny Mackay and his lobbyists endeavored to pose exclusively in the attitude of public benefactors!

Before the committee appears one of the two individuals to whom I have already referred, and as his appearance was heralded in advance and his words before the committee reported at length and printed in public newspapers—having been put in grammatical shape by the considerate reporter—there is no breach of committee etiquette in this announcement. He came to advocate the passage of the Johnny Mackay contract bill. And on his first or second appearance, when quickly questioned as to the value of the franchise he sought, he frankly or inadvertently admitted that it was worth $46,000,000 to his company to secure the privileges and prerogatives granted in his measure. There were two members of this House listening attentively, one of whom was accustomed to hear and record with accuracy the language of public speakers, who have reported and who can now testify to the fact of the making of this admission. Indeed the admission was caught up and italicized on the instant by one of these hearers. The injurious effect of such an admission upon the prospects of his bill flashed upon the mind of its advocate when I remarked that the people of the United States were entitled to that $46,000,000, retained in their own pockets or in their multiplications of the states were entitled to the states were or in their public Treasury or otherwise saved to themselves, if there was to be anything in the form of a governmental system of postal telegraph. Then came retraction or denial as to the utterance, and a desperate endeavor to support the denial by the evidence of those who failed to listen when the important confession was made.

But I assert it here who am entitled to speak on this subject, and competent withal. I say that if you pass a Johnny Mackay contract bill or any contract-job proposition of the kind that has been outlined before this Congress, and whether you intend it as the contract by the congress and whether you intend it. bill or any contract-job proposition of the kind that has been outlined before this Congress—and whether you intend it or not—you are in one way and another taking from the people of the United States within a decade of service or a seven-years' charter existence more than $46,000,000. And this is counting nothing beyond the mere fact of relative disadvantage in the payment of prices that are or will be far in excess of the tariff that should be; this is not taking into consideration the fact and inevitable effect of continuing to keep the commercial interests of this country, ay, and the political control of affairs to a great extent, under the espionage and at all times under the pressure and sometimes under the absolute and exclusive control or dictation of a sometimes under the absolute and exclusive control or dictation of a telegraph corporation management.

It may be, it must be presumed that the contract-job gentleman had ciphered on profits of the seven years of permit to run a wire into the principal post-offices of the land, or take messages on a Government stamp and with Government connection prestige. Reflect upon the profits which this indicates as the fruits of the tariff then existing.

Mr. Chairman, why should the people of the United States pay from 50 per cent. above reasonable rates to ten times the figures on a reasonable tariff for telegraphic transmission of their letters? For the benefit of the few soulless incorporators. What else for?

Ah, but there are no sinister objects in the original propositions for a contract job such as was laid before honorable committees of this Congress in behalf of the Johnny Mackay combination. I declare that manifestly—on the very face of the submission—there were. But if you insist that there were not or could not have been, I might inquire why it was then that ten thousand shares of the stock of the so-called Postal Telegraph Company was sent to a member of this House, without request or agreement of any kind for a consideration, after he had been elected a member of this body? That honorable gentleman exhibited this stock to two of his fellow-members upon the floor of this Chamber before he returned it to the source of corruption from whence it came. If 10,000 shares were sent to one Representative, how many shares to other Representatives who returned the bribe without exposure? And what does this indicate as to the stock-watering process planned and already begun, in hope and expectation of the passage of a job-contract measure by the Senate and House of Representatives?

What the people need, what the people want and call for when they are enlightened upon this subject, what the people should have in the premises, is a genuine postal telegraph system, such as exists in every other civilized nation outside of the North American Continent; and anything short of this means not only all of the evil we at present suffer in the way of relatively extortionate charges for the transmission of letters by telegraph, but an increasing oppression in the form of wagereduction, and multiplying and enlarging outrages in methods of manipulating the politics of the country for the benefit of soulless corporations and their retinue of agents and flunkies. This is the simplicity of the whole matter.

It is claimed that a contract-job plan for a postal telegraph exactly follows the present system of mail carriage on railroads and steamboats. I deny it. The real analogy in this connection is more aptly between the mail-bag and the electric wire—the former and its custodian being always the sworn employé of the Government, directly responsible to and paid by the Government, and none other. It will be remembered that when the first telegraph lines were constructed many simple-minded folks were led to believe or imagine that the noise or the music made by the playing of the wind on the strands and through the insulator passages was caused by the rushing of little rolls of letter pages through the belly of the wire. We now laugh at such imaginings, but they suggest a correct comparison at this time.

It is claimed that by the contract-job system the Government will obtain a postal telegraph for the people without the expenditure of a dollar from the national Treasury. There is a falsehood in this claim. But, as I have elsewhere and repeatedly shown, under my bill there would be no outlay required from the public Treasury save such as might be necessary for the engraving and the printing of the bonds for the loan authorized and a small additional expense, perhaps, on stationery accounts. I will append to my speech an editorial from a newspaper, the management of which is neither politically nor personally friendly to me, drawing special attention to this proposed people's loan for a people's line, and I will express here the hope that the readers of my remarks on this occasion will do me and will do the cause of a genuine postal telegraph the justice to note the provisions of my bill in the particulars just indicated. Mr. William H. Storey, a well-known and experienced telegraph superintendent, writes as follows to a member of this House:

The best brief argument in favor of Mr. Sumner's bill is presented in the bill itself. It is on all accounts vastly preferable to the other bills on the same subject now pending in Congress.

Have we had any indications of popular demand as a direct specific result of the agitation in Congress, in this Forty-eighth term of the National Legislature?

April 12, 1884, Tammany Society, New York, by unanimous vote, adopted the following resolution, which was introduced by Hon. Henry

A. Gumbleton:

Resolved, That we favor the passage of the Sumner bill, relating to the postal telegraph system, now pending in Congress, and believe that such a system honestly administered will give the people of this country a cheap and reliable means of communication under the management of able officers directly responsible to the people, and thus take this adjunct of the post-office out of the dangerous control of gigantic, corrupting monopolies.

The New York Anti-monopoly League and Lodges of the Knights of abor, embracing or representing a membership of over one hundred Labor, embracing or representing a membership of over one nundred thousand persons, passed a similar resolution.

Both houses of the Legislature of California promptly and by overwhelming vote approved the text of my bill. And this winter, without suggestion of mine, the house of representatives of the Ohio Legislature, by more than a two-thirds vote, passed a similar preamble and resolution. The fact that this preamble and resolution was defeated in the senate of the Legislature of Ohio only contributed to the emphasis of indorsement, inasmuch as it is notorious that agents of the Western Union Company brought all their accustomed appliances to bear in the city of Columbus in order to secure such a defeat; thus marking the city of Columbus in order to secure such a deleat; thus marking the appreciation which the monopoly has of the force of such approvals, and giving another exhibition—as announced by some of the papers in the interior whose correspondents and publishers are not bound by the Associated Press ligatures—of the corrupt motives, dispositions, and deeds of the masters of this great telegraph corporation.

Later still, both houses of the Michigan Legislature, as I am informed, without a dissenting voice passed this preamble and these reso-

Whereas the interests of the people of the State of Michigan, of whatever occupation, calling, or profession, and of every shade of political belief, demand that the Government of the United States undertake the business of transmitting by telegraph, 'intelligence between the inhabitants of the land,'' as proposed by the measure now before Congress known as the "Sumner postal telegraph bill: "Therefore,

Be tt resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Michigan, That we heartily indorse the postal telegraph bill introduced in Congress by Hon. CHARLES A. SUMNER, of California, believing it to be an eminently wise and practical measure, and one imperatively demanded by the interests of the people of the United States.

States.

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and are hereby, earnestly requested to support and by all honorable means endeavor to secure the passage of said bill.

Mr. J. B. Taltavall, editor and publisher of the Telegraphers' Advocate, writes to me under recent date that after a careful comparison of views the telegraphers of the country are practically unanimous in their support of my measure, "believing it to be in all respects a most excellent bill, and best adapted to give the country a true postal telegraph system. Mr. Chairman, it is easy enough to bring forward propositions for which great ameliorating force and effect may be claimed by the adroit and audacious demagogue; against which the real monopolists and op-pressors of the people will neither raise nor entertain any objection. In fact, it is a part of the policy of the monopolists of the country to en-courage the introduction into legislative bodies, as well as to applied the presentation before popular audiences, of propositions in which and by which it may plausibly be claimed that there is a remedy for a vast number of political evils or amelioration for some one great and growing social grievance, when in point of fact the propositions are of no practical value whatsoever. Indeed, we have probably all of us seen or heard commendations bestowed by monopolists upon plans of reform, to be accomplished through legislation and otherwise, which it was asserted and declared would be wholesale in scope and permanent and increasingly beneficent in effect. This is an old trick of the arch enemies of the people. The monopolists not only encourage but have learned to instigate and foster advocacies of the character indicated; and alas! some of their emissaries are to-day applauded by the multitude who have not as yet discerned the particular phase of imposition in which their present pets are engaged.

There should be no great or widespread mistaking as to the true radical reform proposition. The one that comes down to every-day service and touches the heart of the matter—this is of the kind of propositions and touches the heart of the matter—this is of the kind of propositions that are abhorrent to the monopolists. And the men who suggest or promulgate or plead for them are hated and slandered and ostracized to the extent of the ability of the chief organized oppressors of the land. Now the monopolists are well aware of the fact that if the people through and by their Government once possessed the control and reasonable use of the telegraph as a transmitter of correspondence, there would be little less than a revolution in those departments of business and social activity that are affected by instantaneous and cheap intercommunication.

We have few noble specimens of metropolitan journalism in this country. Our leading dailies throughout the length and breadth of the land are as a rule the serfs of the telegraph monopoly. Some are most ably conducted in all respects; and yet when it comes to questions affecting the telegraph monopoly they are dumb or hesitate not to publish that which the mercenary masters of the great lines digitate or desire. which the mercenary masters of the great lines dictate or desire. And if you pass a contract-job bill they will remain the slaves of a telegraph if you pass a contract-job bill they will remain the slaves of a telegraph combination, with its associated press attachment, the same as they now are and have been during the last twenty years of our national life. With what unblushing impudence does the Jay Gould telegraph monopoly and its avowed and its secretly bound allies—some of the latter professing competition at this moment, perhaps—talk about the "partisan management" of a Government telegraph, when in addition to the record relating to this subject, to which I referred in my speech in this House one year ago, in addition to the record showing the contribution of the telegraph monopoly to the great "Presidential steal" of 1876—'77, we have the very recent history of the attempt to manipulate the news by telegraph in New York so as to defeat the will of the people as expressed by the vote of that Commonwealth at the last election!

The honest man connected with the management of the telegraph and news monopoly in New York city at the time alluded to—I refer to Mr. Heuston (who ought to be summoned before a committee of in-Mr. Heuston (who ought to be summoned before a committee of inquiry appointed and empowered to investigate by the next Congress)—will testify to the shameless efforts of Jay Gould and others to misrepresent and misreport and otherwise give aid and comfort to a diabolical scheme for changing the true count of the ballots in the Empire State in November last, for the purpose of depriving Grover Cleveland of the electoral vote of that Commonwealth and transferring it to another. Finding that it was impracticable to carry out his plan and purpose in the direction indicated, Mr. Jay Gould gives the extreme illustration of his effrontery and his brazen hope to yet secure "amiable relations" with the incoming administration by telegraphing congratulations to the President-elect. I should add that report says that the hailing dis-

the President-elect. I should add that report says that the hailing dispatch was appropriately and promptly consigned to the waste-basket. Give us a genuine Government postal telegraph and you at once emancipate the press of this country from a thralldom that has prevented free thought and honest advocacy through the columns of the majority of the city dailies of our country.

Mr. Chairman, I am apprehensive, in fact I am convinced, that anything short of the comprehensive measure which proposes and disposes, plans, and appropriates money adequate to the construction of an entire network of telegraphic lines (such as is provided for in the bill which I have introduced) will not bring to our people the achievement designed and desired under the name of a postal telegraph. If you start out with the construction of skeleton lines—lines between principal cities—you will have competition concentrated side by side, with consequent losses to the Government, with resultant claims in favor of private management in all or in principal particulars, such as will end in the relinquishment of the Government enterprise.

The sum which I have set down as sufficient for the comprehensive construction is, as compared with benefits sure to follow, an insignificant price for the great achievement. Pass this, or a substantially similar measure, and let the administration proceed to faithfully act upon and measure, and let the administration proceed to fathfully act upon and under it, and there can be no manner of question that within a few short months the people of this country who are accustomed to correspondence will be transmitting a large proportion of their communications over the electric wire, and by their patronage yielding to the Government not merely a great interest upon the investment, but rapidly returning the capital sum itself into the coffers of the nation.

And pray do not forget that under the terms of House bill 98, which I will append to my speech, the General Government will not have to advance more than five or six thousand dollars—for bond and circular printing, &c .- in order to obtain for our people the vast and incalculable benefits of a genuine Government postal telegraph. To avoid the objection of "enormous cost to the Government," among other reasons, this plan of a popular loan was devised and submitted by me.

By the general contract-job bills which have been reported the figures are set at from 50 per cent. to ten times above the proper charges for the beginning of operations. The contract bills fix a tariff of 20 to 50 cents for ten-word messages. My bill is for a uniform charge not exceeding 10 cents for ten words between all offices. Pass bill number 98, or one of such a pattern, and within a few years the tariff therein prescribed may be reduced more than one-half, with a following patronage that will maintain the lines and provide good wages for the laborers engaged in operating and in preserving and extending the constructions. Nor will the time then be far distant when between all points in our great nation the lightning will take the plain text or the cipher of the citizen at rates that will literally rival in cheapness the postage charges of to-day. The people of this country should rise up a person and demand the passage of a genuine postal telegraph bill.

The following convenient index and summary of House bill 98 is from the San Francisco Morning Call of January 2, 1884:

SUMNER'S POSTAL TELEGRAPH BILL.

Congressman SUNNER'S postal telegraph bill provides for the construction of new lines to every town in the United States containing four hundred inhabitants or more south of the northernmost boundary of Washington Territory, Separate provision is made for aline to Alaska. The rates proposed are 10 cents for each ten words or less, exclusive of address and signature, and 5 cents for each diditional ten words or less. The telegraph system is to be put under the direction of an official to be created and designated the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General. The duties of the office shall be under the general supervision of the Postmaster-General, it being required, however, that the chief of the Telegraph Bureau shall be a competent electrician. Funds for the construction of telegraph lines are to be obtained by the sale of United States bonds ($25,000,000), bearing 3 per cent, interest, in amounts not exceeding $50 each, redeemable in twenty years from date of issue and payable in thirty years. The cities at which the interest is made payable are New York, Chicago, and San Francisco. Postmasters are authorized to ack as agents for the sale of such bonds. The eighth section of the bill provides that the Postmaster-General shall cause to be issued postal-telegraph cards of the denominations of 10 cents and 20 cents, on one side of which word-spaces shall be ruled for the writing of postal-telegraph messages. These postal-telegraph cards of the denominations of 10 cents and 20 cents, on one side of which word-spaces shall be ruled for the writing of nostal-telegraph enseages. These postal-telegraph cards may be deposited in any letter-box on a letter-carrier route, and if the number of words written does not exceed the number paid for by the purchaser of the card the postmaster shall order them dispatched in the order in which they are received. This will enable

A POSTAL TELEGRAPH—A MORE EAPID METHOD OF CARRYING THE LETTERS OF THE PEOPLE.

Low uniform rates between all points: ten words for 10 cents, twenty words for 15 cents, thirty words for 20 cents, forty words for 25 cents.

A people's loan for a people's line. Bonds in the sum of $50 or less payable in twenty to thirty years. (See section 10.)

Impartial press reports guaranteed. Construction to be authorized simultaneously in all parts of the Union.

The people's line can be speedily built by the people, on the plans and specifications published by the Postmaster-General. (See section 14.) The people of each locality, on routes named, can proceed at once to build.

The profits of the telegraph monopolists, legitimate and by market secrets and manipulations, are enormous. The cost of the electrical force is nominal. The rates fixed in preceding bill will pay profits to the General Government. There never will be any speedy and permanent and perfect emancipation from telegraph monopoly, extortion, and tymnny save by a Government postal telegraph. The preceding bill is the only comprehensive and direct proposition for a complete Government telegraph now before Congress.

"Some that oppose a postal telegraph allege as a chief objection that it will be too great a power in the hands of any party, and will increase the facilities for corruption in politics. The fact that the leaders of both parties are lukewarm toward the project is a pretty good indication that they do not regard it as much of a lever."—Scaramento Biee.

In the nature of the case, a Government postal telegraph could not be a party lever, as it has been under private monopoly management. No partisan advantage could be taken of a postal telegraph.

The New York Anti-Monopoly League has passed the following resolution: "Resolved, That we call upon Congress in the name of the American people to take up at once and with earnest purpose those few great measures that are at this time of fundamental importance to the country; that we especially and emphatically call upon both Houses to take favorable action upon Mr. SUMNER's bill providing for a postal telegraph."

"Two bills designed to introduce and establish postal telegraphy in connection with the Federal postal service have been already offered in the present Congress. Edmunss has introduced one in the Senate and SUMNER another in the lower House. There can be no doubt that the Summer bill is incomparably better than the other. Under the provisions of the Edmunds bill, it will require eight years for anything approaching the general introduction of postal telegraphy. Meanwhile the telegraph monopolists would continue to enjoy the immense revenues hitherto derived from fettering that great element of nature which Franklin's genius tendered as a blessing to mankind. The oppressive monopolies of railroad shipping, and manufacturing, while harmful in every State, have not been more boldly infamous in their careers than the monopoly of the telegraph privilegres.

"While Edmunds has pretended to yield to the universal appreciation of this fact, he has yet marked his measure with the features of unnecessary delay. The relief demanded is of such a character that the people will not brook dilatory methods in obtaining it. And there is no reason why such relief should not come promptly. Summer was loyal to this idea when he prepare

HON. WILLIAM E. ROBINSON,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 12, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 8138) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1836.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York, said:
Mr. CHAIRMAN: On the 16th day of December, 1881, now over three years ago, I offered a joint resolution to reduce the postage on single letters from 3 cents to 1 cent, which was read, ordered printed, and referred to the Post-Office Committee. That committee did not rise to the ferred to the Post-Ome Committee. That committee did not rise to the level of statesmanship, which required the passage of that bill. They afterward adopted a half-way measure, reducing postage to 2 cents. Had they adopted my suggestion the revenue on 1-cent postage would be greater now than under the 2-cent law.

At the opening of the next Congress, on the 11th of December, 1883, I again introduced a bill for a uniform 1-cent postage law. Again the committee have failed to rise to the level of statesmanship, and are urging half-way measures and driblets of reform, retarding the approach of that certainly coming day when a uniform penny postage will carry the correspondence of the American people to all parts of the United States. It is a mere question of time how long this reform can be delayed by the bunglers of legislation. It is as sure to come as the rising of to-mor-

on the 24th of September, 1882, I published a long letter in the New York Sun, in which I gave a history of our postal system and reasons for coming at once to a uniform penny rate of postage on all single letters; and on the 21st day of December, 1882, I delivered an extended speech on the subject advocating that rate.

After the introduction of my bill I received numerous letters from prominent men in all parts of the country approving the measure, and many newspapers and incorporated associations published articles and passed resolutions in favor of it.

The New York Grocers' Monthly Review of October 1, 1882, saver.

The New York Grocers' Monthly Review of October 1, 1882, says:

Hon. W. E. Robinson, of New York, and Hon. John Hill, of New Jersey, are the two champions in Congress in favor of cheap postage. The cheap postal subject should enter largely into the discussion of the day, and should receive the attention and have the support of those Representatives who have the interest of the people at heart.

The American Grocer and Dry Goods Chronicle of December 18, 1884,

Says:

The penny postage bill (H. R. 1001) is by far the most important, and is not, as some may at first conclude, an impracticable measure or one likely to reduce the revenues of the Department. It was introduced in the House of Representatives December 11, 1833, by Hon. W. E. ROEINSON. It is more than probable that the first year of penny letter postage would find the Department self-sustaining. No other measure aiming to benefit the postal service will secure as great benefits to the people as Mr. ROEINSON's bill providing for penny postage. Give it encouragement by asking your Representatives in Congress to support it. Let every business man whom the provisions of the bill most directly affect write a personal appeal, backed up by weighty petitions, to his Congressman.

This advice was followed, and petitions were sent from a large number of individuals and associations.

The Brooklyn (N. Y.) Eagle of January 5, 1885, says:

Congressman Robinson's bill establishing a uniform rate of penny postage to any part of the United States is now waiting action in the House. There is a disposition to concede that the reduction of letter postage to 2 cents was but a half-way measure, the tendency of which was to interfere with the more radical change proposed. Strong efforts are being made to secure the passage of the bill. The business community is practically united in its support, and every day Congressmen are in receipt of letters urging them to vote for the change.

The present postage laws inflict upon the people the most unjust and offensive system of taxation. The people want cheap postage, and you refuse to give it to them. The conveyance of written sealed letters is the legitimate business of the post-office. It is not its business to become a common carrier nor to run package-express companies. If you can carry merchandise at 1 cent a pound you should not charge more than that for letters; and if 1 cent a pound does not pay expenses you have no right to impose a tax upon the letter-writing community for have no right to impose a tax upon the letter-writing community for the benefit of other parties. If you can convey a pound of newspapers or of books for 1 cent you can convey a pound of sealed letters for 1 cent, and all that you charge over that is oppressive, unjust, and unequal taxation. Yet in this bill you propose to convey one kind of postal matter for 1 cent a pound and another kind for 32 cents a pound.

Mr. Cyrus W. Field, who is a millionaire, comes to the post-office in New York with a pound of his newspapers and asks how much it will less to convey it to San Francisco. He is informed that it will be will cost to convey it to San Francisco. He is informed that it will be cent. A poor widow who has a sick child in Newark wants to write a few words of consolation, and she presents a half or a quarter ounce of the same material and asks how much that will cost. She is informed that it costs 2 cents. She asks: "How can that be? This rich man can convey his package of paper at 1 cent a pound, and you will not let me send mine for less than thirty-two times as much; is that fair?"

The postmaster is dumb and she remains unable to solve the mystery of demonstration of the same man that the control of the same man that the same man of democratic postal equality. It is a democratic axiom that one class of people should not be taxed for the benefit of another class. Now, it you lay a tax for conveying half an ounce of matter for the letter-writer and only I cent a pound for the newspaper writer, you violate this democratic axiom and tax the former for the benefit of the latter. It is unjust taxation of the poor for the benefit of the rich. Every poor man's breakfast-table is taxed in favor of the wealthy monopolist.

While the people of the United States have been clamoring for postage reform, what reform has Congress granted? Last session you passed law allowing transient newspapers to be sent at 1 cent for four ounces. There was little benefit in that to anybody. These transient newspapers are in a great measure sent by poor people in place of letters, conveying intelligence either by clandestine writing or signs. They accumulate in vast amounts of unclaimed matter, which are never delivered and give vast trouble to the post-offices throughout the country. Would it not be preferable to allow the people to write a letter of half an ounce at 1 cent than to burden the mails with matter at 1 cent for

That reform was frivolous and useless. In this bill you propose to load the mails with matter at 1 cent a pound. Not one in a thousand will receive any benefit from it. You also propose to put the price of sealed letters at 2 cents an ounce. Very few desire this ridiculous reform or will be benefited by it. I understand that there are only about 5 per cent. of the letters sent through the mails that are over half an This reform, therefore, can benefit only five out of every hun-It is intended to tax ninety-five of our people for the benefit of the five. Half an ounce is the proper standard weight for letters. The thousand millions of letters that are sent or will be sent yearly through our mails average less than one-third of an ounce. The reform wanted is for the ninety and five who want to send letters under half an ounce, and not for the five who make them over half an ounce. driblets of reform. It is a vicious kind of legislation that enacts general laws as riders upon appropriation bills.

The country calls for a reform-postage bill to emancipate the letter-writers from the unjust burdens imposed upon them. Can we not have a committee on postage that will formulate and report a new and sensible postage law; that will find out what the conveyance of letters, the legitimate part of the post-office system, costs, and put upon each letter, which scarcely ever exceeds half an ounce, the proper paying charge for conveyance? The people have a right to have their letters conveyed at the lowest paying rates. Very few want any increase of weight, but all want a reduction of rate. No man dares and no man does deny that the first-class matter conveyed through our mails can be carried and handled at 1 cent on the half ounce. Every cent collected on letters to make up for the losses on other matter is an oppressive tax on the people using the mails for their legitimate purposes. It is a wonder that they do not rise in rebellion against the outrage.

Now, I am not opposed to reducing the rate of postage on second-class matter or newspapers. I am in favor of every reduction that can be made upon the conveyance of public intelligence, but I am opposed to all legislation that compels the continuance of a system that robs the many for the benefit of the few. Make newspaper postage free if you like, and if it be a public benefit to have knowledge conveyed free, let it be charged to the Treasury, and not exacted by unjust taxation of 100 per cent. on the great mass of the people, who pay the postage on first-class matter and pay double what it costs.

I believe the time will come when postage on single letters will be reduced much below 1 cent, and that postage stamps will be sold at four or five for 1 cent. This will be the grand system of educating the people. Set all your people—men, women, and children, of all races and all conditions of life—to writing letters in place of spending their time in scenes of dissipation and folly, and you will soon have an educated and intelligent population.

Give us a well-digested and consistent postal law. Cut down the enormous folly of franking, abandon the abused system of penalty envelopes, abolish the postal-card abomination, encourage newspaper cirvelopes, abolish the postal-card abomination, encourage newspaper circulation by conveying them at the very lowest possible rates, but above all see that the sealed letters carrying messages of business, of sympathy, and of love shall be conveyed at their cost, and not taxed to favor other classes of postal matter. Let the rate of transportation on the 70,000,000 pounds of newspaper matter conveyed during the year, paying only about 3 per cent. of the postal revenue, bestill further reduced if justice will allow, make it free if you please, but let the 35,000,000 pounds of letters, which pay nearly the entire amount of postal revenue, be relieved from the tax now unjustly imposed upon them to pay for the transportation and handling of other postal matter. the transportation and handling of other postal matter.

Abolishing the Internal-Revenue System.

Who steals my purse steals trash;

But he that filches from me my good name, Robs me of that which not enriches him, And makes me poor indeed.

REMARKS

HON. JOHN D. WHITE, OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 3, 1885.

Rising to a question of privilege-

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. A paper published in New York called
The Voice, which claims to be a temperance journal, has seen fit to publish the following paragraph about myself:

LEGISLATIVE MEASURES-DO THE WHISKY MEN WANT THE EARTH?

Mr. White, of Kentucky, has introduced a bill into the House of Representatives providing that the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue be abolished and the whole system of internal taxation done away with. This bill is said to have been framed at the instance of the whisky men. Mr. White is the Congressman who recently applied an insulting term to Speaker Carlisle.

That was sent to me by Mr. R. B. Neal, editor of The Worker, a temperance paper published in Louisville, Ky., otherwise I would not have seen it. Now, Mr. Speaker, if that came from a source claiming to be an enemy to the cause which I have advocated and maintained I should treat it with the same indifference I have treated hundreds of others of a similar character, but coming as it does from a paper professing the principles of temperance, of which I believe every member on this floor will accord to me that I have been a consistent and persistent advocate ever since I became a Representative in the Forty-fourth Congress and during the Forty-seventh Congress and also during the present Congress, I think it requires some personal notice at my hands.

Now, sir, it is a matter of record that in the Forty-fourth Congress I introduced a bill into this House for the prohibition by the national Congress of the sale of intoxicating liquors for any other purpose than mechanical, medicinal, or scientific. In the Forty-seventh Congress I introduced the same bill. In the Forty-eighth Congress I introduced a similar bill, slightly modifying it and providing for punishment, which before I had left to the wisdom of the committee. I will send to the Clerk's desk a copy of that bill to be read.

Mr. HENLEY. How long is this matter about being read to last?

Mr. CURTIN. What is it all about?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky rises to question of personal privilege and is stating his question of privilege to the House

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I ask the Clerk to read. The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 596) to lessen crime and human suffering from alcoholism by re-stricting the use of distilled spirits to scientific, mechanical, and medicinal purposes.

Whereas the injurious effects from the use as a beverage of intoxicating liquors stricting the use of distilled spirits to scientific, mechanical, and medicinal purposes.

Whereas the injurious effects from the use as a beverage of intoxicating liquors are universally admitted; and Whereas spirituous liquors are powerful instruments for evil and corruption in our elections; and Whereas the unbridled traffic in spirituous liquors promotes contentions, riots, ignorance, and poverty; and Whereas the effects of alcoholism is visited through the parent "upon the third and fourth generations;" and Whereas the effects of alcoholism are filling our prisons, houses of correction, and institutions of charity with criminals and sufferers, and covering the land with woe and misery: Therefore,

Be themself, de., That on and after the 30th day of June, 1884, no person, except as hereinafter provided, shall manufacture or sell or keep for sale that substance known as ethyl alcohol, hydrated oxide of ethyl, or spirit of wine, or any other intoxicating liquor which can be produced by the fermentation of grain, starch, molasses, or sugar, including all dilutions and mixtures of sugar. No person shall manufacture, sell, or keep for sale as a beverage any intoxicating liquor whatever, including all, wine, and beer.

Sec. 2. That any person convicted of a willful violation of any of the provisions of the preceding section shall be fined not exceeding 5500, or imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Sec. 3. That no intoxicating liquors whatever, including ale, wine, and beer, shall be imported into the United States from any foreign port or place. All goods or merchandise imported contrary to this section, and the vessel wherein the same shall be imported contrary to this section, and the vessel wherein the same shall be imported, together with her cargo, tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be forfeited to the United States; and such goods, wares, merchandise, ship, or vessel, and cargo shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted, and condemned in like manner and under the sam

SEC. 8. That nothing in the preceding sections shall be construed so as to limit the time of any license for the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors which is at present operating: Provided, That no extension of time nor any new license shall be hereafter granted for the sale of any intoxicating liquors what

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Now that bill which the Clerk has read was referred to the Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic and was reported back by Mr. KLEINER, accompanied by the following report:

The Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, having considered the bill (H. R. 596) to lessen crime and human suffering from alcoholism by restricting the use of distilled spirits to scientific, mechanical, and medicinal purposes, report the same back adversely, and recommend that it lie on the table.

Mr. LORE. I make the point that this is not a matter of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Delaware makes the point that the gentleman from Kentucky is not stating any question of personal privilege.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I thought that was admitted, Mr. Speaker, or I should have addressed myself to that point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. So far as the gentleman from Kentucky has gone the Chair has been unable to see any question of personal privilege in what the gentleman has stated.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.
Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I move to lay the appeal on the table.
Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to Rule IX:

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of members individually in their representative capacity only.

Now, sir, here is a charge in the extract which I have just read from the New York paper, which was sent to me by my friend the editor of a temperance paper in the city of Louisville, to whom I have already referred, calling my attention to the fact that this article in The Voice did me great injustice. Otherwise I would never have seen it. It charges me with preparing a bill in the interest of the whisky men, in this article which is headed, "Do the whisky men want the earth?" I claim this not only affects me as a Representative, but affects the honor and dignity of this House, for I am a member of this House. a member of the House, after having advocated certain principles, introduces a bill that I have introduced here and then can present other bills which seem to favor the whisky interest, and can be justly charged that he is doing it for the whisky interest, it seems to me it rises to the dignity of a personal question at least.

It is to address myself to that question that I have risen, and to recite the history of this subject and my action with it, that I began in the way I did, and no one made the point of order, or else I should have begun by reading the rule under which I made the point of order. But in order to save the time of the House and consume as little of its time as possible at this late hour in the session I did not adopt that

I now yield the floor to the decision of the Chair. If I am entitled to the floor on that decision I will proceed, otherwise I will take my

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman presents, certainly, a question of personal explanation, but the Chair has been unable to see that a question of personal privilege under the rules of the House is presented, and which would give the gentleman the right to occupy the floor.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. May I be permitted to call the attention of the Chair to the last sentence but one in the newspaper article to which I first called attention and which I have sent to the desk?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will cause the sentence to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

This bill is said to have been framed at the instance of the whisky men. Mr. White is the Congressman who recently applied an insulting term to Speaker Carlisle.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The Chair will observe, as stated in that article, that a direct charge is brought against me. In response I wish to state that I have never in my life applied an insulting term or epithet to the Speaker of this House

There is not a man on this floor who has a higher regard for the Speaker of the House than I have, and I am ready to offer the usual resolution complimenting him in the very highest terms on the fair, impartial, and proper manner in which he has discharged the duties of his office. The last clause but one in the article accuses me of having prepared or framed a bill at the instance of the whisky men, and I claim in that I have the right not only to deny that charge, which I do most emphatically, but to show conclusively by the RECORD that it is false from the beginning to the end; and I was proceeding to address myself to that subject when I was interrupted by the gentleman from Delaware, who made the point that I did not present a question of

I understood the Chair had recognized it as such by allowing me to proceed for some time, and of course I did not have the rule read, for the reason that I did not suppose there could be any question as to the fact that I had the right to take the floor for that purpose. As I have said, I now yield to the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that it would hear the gentleman on his question of privilege, no point of order having been made. The Chair indulged the gentleman from the beginning of his remarks until the point of order was made. The gentleman from Delaware having made the point of order, the Chair was then ready to decide the question.

If, however, the gentleman desires to be heard further the Chair will indulge him.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, what is this bill which The Voice criticises in the article to which I have called attention? I desire to read it for the information of the House. It is a joint resolution which I introduced on the 26th day of January, 1885—No. 319.

Mr. LORE. I make the point of order that the gentleman does not

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky will proceed, and the Chair will determine whether or not he presents a question of privilege. So far the Chair thinks the gentleman has not

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. This is a joint resolution which I introduced in the following terms:

Whereas it has transpired that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the present Secretary of the Treasury have, by unwarranted regulation, assumed to extend the bonded period for distilled spirits for two hundred and eight days, in direct violation of the action of the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses; and
Whereas the tobacco tax is an unnecessary burden upon the people, and is a fraud, useful only upon our statute-books for the purposes of the tobacco monopolists; and fraud, useful only upon our statute-books for the purposes of the tobacco monopolists; and

Whereas the present system of internal-revenue taxation is far less beneficial to the people than useful to continue a highly protected and infernal industry, manipulated by unscrupulous capitalists, who strive to corrupt Congress and to control the Government in the interest of their monopoly of the tobacco and whisky trade; and
Whereas there is no longer any guarantee that the laws in relation to internal revenue will be honestly executed, although $5,000,000 be annually appropriated for that purpose: Therefore,

*Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all acts or parts of acts concerning the superintendence of the assessment or collection of any duties or taxes imposed by any law providing internal revenue be, and the same are hereby, abolished from and after July 1, 1885.

Mr. Speaker, for that joint resolution The Voice of New York arraigns me as having framed a bill at the instance of the whisky men. It is well known to the House, because for four years the question has been discussed, that there is a whisky lobby in Washington, that there is a whisky combination, reaching from the great lakes to the Gulf and from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, in favor of reducing the tax on whisky and intoxicating liquors generally.

When that was proposed in the Forty-seventh Congress I opposed it because it was giving to the whisky monopoly every cent that the tax was reduced. If there were 100,000,000 of gallons in bond and the tax was reduced from 90 to 50 cents it was equivalent to giving to the whisky ring $40,000,000, and hence I opposed it. Again, when in the Forty-seventh Congress a modified bill came into this House asking for the extension of the bonded period for two years, or practically a loan of the money invested in the whisky in bond, I opposed that also.

Mr. LORE. Mr. Speaker, I must insist upon the point of order that the gentleman does not state a question of privilege, and beg the Chair to pass upon it. There is nothing in what he has stated to show that to pass upon it. There is nothing in what he has stated to show that his character as a Representative on this floor has been assailed.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I suppose we had as well settle the question here, and I submit to the ruling of the Chair. The Chair understands the point I have made, and I submit to the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that the Chair does not think the criticism of a newspaper upon the character or manner of introducing a bill in the House of Representatives is that sort of an attack upon a member in his representative capacity that raises it to the dignity of a question of privilege under the rules of the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and I desire to be heard on the appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious matter not only to me, but it is rapidly becoming one to the whole country. At the last Presidential election more than 150,000 voters severed their strong attachments to the Democratic and Republican parties to enter their protest against the proceedings of both parties.

Mr. TUCKER. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman is not addressing himself to the appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is entitled to be heard on the appeal.

Mr. TUCKER. But he is not proceeding in order, I submit, by addressing himself to the question on which he appeals.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I have listened to the gentleman from Virginia many a time, and must confess I have always been disappointed, because he seldom sticks to the text himself, and he ought not to object to my using some discretion in this matter.

The question of order, as I understand, that has been raised is whether the article which I have read constitutes a question of personal privilege. I believe it does, for reasons which I have partially stated and others which I propose to submit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman yield a moment to receive a message from the Senate?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I would like to explain that when I introduced the first resolution in the Forty-fourth Congress to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage, I was then persuaded as I am now thoroughly convinced that the use of alcoholic liquors as as I am now thoroughly convinced that the use of alcoholic fiquors as a beverage was simply to imbibe a poison, and as the law prohibits the sale of prussic acid, of arsenic, and other poisons except under regulation, that there should be some power to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors which is dragging down to death hundreds of thousands of strong, able-bodied men every year and making widows and orphans, filling the poor-houses, filling the jails and the penitentiaries. I quote from the National Journal as follows:

[From the National Journal, December 17, 1881.]

OUR NATIONAL LIQUOR BILLS.

OUR NATIONAL LIQUOR BILLS.

Estimates are made from time to time based on returns from the Internal Revnue Office, police and other places, hospitals, insane asylums, poor-houses, and other charitable institutions, from which it is calculated with reasonable certainty that our liquor bills amount yearly to not less than—

1. Direct expenses, $600,000,000.

2. Indirect expenses, $600,000,000.

3. Intemperance burns and destroys property amounting to $10,000,000.

4. It destroys 70,000 lives.

5. It makes 30,000 widows.

6. It makes 30,000 widows.

7. It makes 500 maniacs.

8. It instigates 250 murders.

9. It causes 500 suicides.

10. It consigns to jail 500,000 criminals.

11. And greater even than all this, it endangers the inheritances of liberty left us by debauching the voters and making instruments for upholding corruption by means of the ballot-box.

Mr. TULLLY. I rise to a point of order that the gentleman is not

Mr. TULLY. I rise to a point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the question before the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The report on that bill I have had read from the Clerk's desk, that it was beneath the dignity of this House. Subsequently I introduced a bill for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic. It is as follows:

Abill to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commission of seven persons, not more than four of whom shall belong to the same political party nor be advocates of prohit ition, who shall be selected solely with reference to personal fitness and capacity for an honest, impartial, and thorough investigation, and who shall hold office until their duties shall be accomplished, but not to exceed two years. It shall be their duty to investigate the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to revenue and taxation, and its general economic, criminal, moral, and scientific aspects in connection with pauperism, crime, social vice, the public health, and general welfare of the people; and also to inquire as to the practical results of license and prohibitory legislation for the prevention of intemperance in the several States of the Union.

SEC. 2. That the said commissioners shall serve without salary; that the necessary expenses incidental to said investigation, not exceeding $10,000, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury prototherwise appropriated, one of the resum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. It shall be the further duty of said commissioners to report the result of their investigation, with such suggestions and recommendations as they may see fit to make, and the expenses attending the same, to the President, within eighteen months after the passage of this act, to be transmitted by him to Congress.

The report on that bill I hold in my hand. It was submitted by

The report on that bill I hold in my hand. It was submitted by Mr. ENGLISH, and is as follows:

The report on that bill I hold in my hand. It was submitted by Mr. English, and is as follows:

Mr. English, from the Select Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 2142:

The committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2142) to provide for a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic, beg leave to report the bill back to the House with a recommendation that it do not pass.

The power to regulate the retail liquor traffic has, from the foundation of the Union, been regarded as the exclusive right of the States rather than of the General Government. Attempts have been made by some of the States on thirty prohibit the manufacture or sale of spirituous or malt liquors, but with little apparent success, and the interests of true temperance and sobriety, so much to be desired, would seem to demand wise and stringent restrictions and effective safeguards in connection with the liquor traffic rather than impractical efforts at absolute prohibition.

To the several States of the Union properly belongs the right to enact such local police regulations as will throw every proper restriction around the liquor traffic compatible with the personal and property rights of the clitzen, but uniform police regulations enacted by Congress practically suited to the different wants and requirements of the people of all the various States would be difficult to frame and more difficult to execute. Any attempt to control the personal habits and private conduct of the individual should be opposed, so long as he does not interfere with the personal rights of others or the peace and order of society in general.

As it is a matter of grave doubt whether Congress has the right to regulate the liquor traffic in the several States of the Union, and as there seems to be no great pressing or urgent necessity for the passage of this bill, your committee hold that it is not advisable to attempt the exercise of doubtful powers by the General Government in these matters, whic

Now, sir, from that report any one can see that the House, representing the American people, does not believe that it is a matter for the National Government to meddle with. Again, in the Democratic platform [cries of "Vote!"] was a protest against sumptuary laws, and a declaration that all laws interfering with individual liberty should not be passed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Is it in order to move to go to the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up the Mexican pension bill? [Laugh-table for the purpose of taking up the Mexican pension bill? [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Kentucky to a question of privilege.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I understand the gentleman yields to me to call up the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I will for that purpose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House go to the business on the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up the Mexican pension bill.

Mr. TUCKER. I withdraw my objection to the bill of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I only yielded to allow the Mexican pension bill to be called up.

I now ask the attention of the House to a letter from quite as prominent a temperance organ as the editor of The Voice. I refer to General Green Clay Smith, who was the Presidential candidate of the Temperance party in 1876. Mr. Speaker, I shall print the entire letter of General Smith to which I have alluded, but I desire to call attention especially to one sentence which coming from such an authority offsets in my opinion the vile charge which has been brought against me by this pretended "Voice" of the temperance cause. General Smith says:

I am perfectly satisfied in my own mind, after a great deal of thought, that the true policy is to repeal the tax on all liquors and tobacco. The Government can not afford to derive revenue from crime. Sooner or later the practice will recoil with redoubled force on the nation. The sooner, therefore, we right ourselves in this matter the better. Throw the matter open free to all. Give the little man an equal chance with the big man, and by this means you destroy the ring monopoly absolutely.

The entire letter is well worth serious consideration. It is as fol-

LOUISVILLE, KY., January 24, 1885.

My DEAR WHITE: Your letter received, and read with pleasure and proper consideration. You are clearly right; the great question before the American people is "How to manage and prohibit the manufacture and sale of liquors as a beverage." There are four essential points to be regarded and practiced in the introduction and accomplishment of any great and invaluable end: First, agitation; second, education; third, consecration; fourth, concentration. We have had for a great number of years agitation, and it seems we have about passed that step in this great work. We want now general education on the subject. The people must know the whole character, force, and power of the ring; its workings, internally and externally; its members, who they are and the amount of money employed in all its departments and for what purpose, and where it comes from and where it goes; the oppressions and crimes of every grade and the increase; the moral and religious wrongs and the effect on our civil and religious liberty. This education must apply to both state and nation, and both must be called upon to assist in its overthrow. This will bring us to consecration to principle. When men are properly educated then will they adhere to and dare to die for principle, and this leads of course to concentration of forces to the accomplishment of the end.

A party is needed for this work and it must be independent of all others, and by the might of its principles, the power and undeniableness of its facts, grow and strengthen until it will be respected and obeyed. We have reached that position; forever hereafter the great pivotal State of New York will be directed in its administrative power by the Prohibitionist. Not only New York but other States, for in the next national election we will poll from one to two millions of votes, if not more. We are educating rapidly, and our men are perfectly consecrated to their views and purposes, and the work of concentration is going on every day.

I am perfectly satisfied in my own mind after a great deal of thought that the true policy is to repeal the tax on all liquors and tobacco. The Government can not afford to derive revenue from crime; sooner or later the practice will recoil with redoubled force on the nation; the sooner therefore we right our selves in this matter the better. Throw the matter open free to all, give the little man an equal chance with the big man, and by this means you destroy the ring monopoly absolutely. Our prison-houses

It is a beautiful idea in the administration of our affairs that an officer of his own volition can override the will of the people, expressed by their representatives, and absolutely do away with an act of Congress. While it is a fearful step, yet I am of the opinion it will inure to the benefit of our cause. A desperate move to defraud the Government and rob the people. Let the people know all about it, keep such acts before the minds of the honest, true citizens, and they will right matters ere long.

Your friend, truly,

GREEN CLAY SMITH.

That I think is a fit and perfect answer to the misrepresentation of The Voice. But I desire to call the attention of this House to a better reason why I introduced joint resolution No. 319. The House will remember that Judge Folger, the late Secretary of the Treasury, held that nothing but Congressional legislation could postpone the collection of the whisky tax. But Secretary McCulloch or Commissioner of Internal Revenue Evans has extended the bonded period for distilled spirits by a simple ruling for six months beyond the time authorized by law. The Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal gives credit to Commissioner Evans, for whom it has acquired great affection, as follows:

GIVING MR. EVANS JUSTICE—THE COMMISSIONER NOT OPPOSED TO A LIBERAL POLICY TO THE WHISKY INTEREST.

[Special to the Courier-Journal.]

Washington, January 15.

Washington, January 15.

The following paragraph appears editorially in the Louisville Evening Times of Tuesday:

"Col. Walter Evans, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, gives notice that he was, and still is, opposed to the policy recently adopted by the Secretary of the Treasury practically extending for seven months the whisky bond period. As Colonel Evans will soon return to Kentucky and re-enter State politics, we gladly put him on record in the matter as a foil against Johnny White's tomahawk."

In justice to Commissioner Evans your correspondent will state that he was not and is not opposed to the policy or the ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury. On the other hand, it is known here that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue was one of the firmest supporters of a liberal policy to the whisky interest, and as soon as the opinion of the Attorney-General was delivered it was he who made the regulations, and he was the only officer of the entire Government who could issue a regulation in the premises. The Secretary of the Treasury could not and did not make a regulation in the premises. The Commissioner, as the law exclusively authorizes, made the regulations, which were simply approved by the Secretary without the slightest change. The Secretary could neither make a regulation on the subject nor compel the Commissioner to make one. The law on that subject is plain.

What is the result? The result is that the whisky ring has circumvented Congress and laughs at those who are innocent enough to hope with Mr. BLOUNT, of Georgia, who introduced a bill to compel the col-lection of the whisky tax as required by law, as follows:

A bill to enforce the collection of taxes on distilled spirits in bonded warehouses. Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, immediately on the expiration of the three years allowed for the payment of the tax on all distilled spirits in bonded warehouses, to proceed to collect the same, notwithstanding any action which may be begun after said time in the process for its exportation.

The fact must not be lost sight of that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means favored the extension of the bonded period for distilled spirits for two years, as shown by the following report, and will not likely object to any informality by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue favoring the whisky ring:

Mr. Morrison, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 5265:

The Committee on Ways and Means, having considered the subject of extending the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits now in warehouse, beg leave to report:

The production of distilled spirits in the United States has become larger than demanded by the market. The taxes are the largest paid by any domestic industry. It suffers in common with other industries from the present depression of trade. The burden from which it chiefly suffers is that directly imposed by the Government. Its relief would probably prevent serious disaster and bankruptey not only to the interest itself, but to associate business interests. This bill proposes not to relieve any liability for taxes now imposed by law, but simply to postpone their payment for a period not exceeding two years, on condition of further security and of the payment of interest on the postponed taxes at the highest rate (of interest) paid by the Government on any of its bonded debt.

It is not without significance that Mr. HEWITT, of New York, in the course of the debate on the whisky-bonded extension bill, 1884, said:

Taxation has nothing to do with morality. I have been brought up to believe that taxation is for revenue, and for revenue only. * * * It is just as legitimate to produce whisky as it is to produce pig-iron.

Hon. T. F. BAYARD, who was dined and wined by the Louisville whisky men on his return a few years since from the Nashville horseraces, said of the whisky business:

The parties engaged in this business are citizens of the United States; their business is as honest and as honorable as any other.

Who can harmonize the assertions above with the National Democratic platform adopted at Chicago July 10, 1884, which declares the following doctrines:

We oppose sumptuary laws which vex the citizen and interfere with individual liberty.

We are opposed to all propositions which upon any pretext would convert the General Government into a machine for collecting taxes to be distributed among the States or the citizens thereof.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what are the facts about the growth of the whisky monopoly, which is not satisfied to attend to its own work of legalized death and destruction, but which seeks to control the government of States, the deliberations of Congress, and dictates to the Treasury officials how they shall perform their executive duties regarding the collection of taxes.

The following tables from the reports of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue will throw much light on the vexed subject:

I may be pardoned for quoting from my colleague from the second district of Kentucky, who alluded to me in his speech on March 22, 1884, as follows. Mr. CLAY said:

I take it there is no moral or religious question connected with the bill, and there should be none in the discussion of the question connected with it; and there will be none unless my colleague on the other side of the House from the State of Kentucky [Mr. White] should deem it necessary to lug into this discussion some of his temperance proclivities and great moral ideas.

I need hardly say that the New York Voice and my colleague enter-tain views very diverse.

If my colleague intended by that remark to exhibit me to this House as a man having temperance proclivities, moral ideas, and religious convictions he has said it well. I trust I shall, in justice to God, my country, my constituents, and my family, always be able to view every question from a moral standpoint.

But if the gentleman sought to parade my views before the Representatives here as fine-spun theories, or to hold me up before the country as an extremist on religion or temperance, I simply say to him and to this House that I do believe in God, the maker and ruler of the universe, but I have never attempted to force my views on any one; and, as for temperance, I hold that every sound, mature person has "the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" in his or her own way, provided they have due respect for the will of the majority, which must always govern in a republic.

Ten years ago, in my first candidacy for public office, I expressed my views on temperance and attempted to set them forth in a bill presented to the Forty-fourth Congress, which I reintroduced in the Forty-seventh Congress and again in this Congress (H. R. 596), which has been reported upon adversely by your Democratic Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic. The bill to establish a commission to collect facts relative to the control of the collect facts relative to the collect fact tive to the alcoholic liquor traffic met with the same fate at Democratic

Again Mr. CLAY said:

The whisky that is now in bond in the State of Kentucky is held and owned by individual citizens throughout the United States, and they are calling upon you not to relieve them on account of the original plant in the manufacture, not to prevent a failure on account of their investment, but to relieve them against an excise tax which is 500 per cent, more than the value of the original plant.

Notwithstanding this fact, it remains true that the whisky men and their representatives protest against the repeal of the entire whisky tax. Like the tobacco monopolists, they want the system kept up, but favor an occasional reduction with timely notice.

I have consulted with my constituents in regard to the propriety of this move to abolish the internal-revenue system. It is well known in my State that the internal-revenue system has ceased to be what it was intended for, namely, an instrument to collect revenue to help pay off the war debt, and it has come to be a monopoly to protect the gigantic distilleries that make from one hundred to five hundred barrels of distilleries that make from one hundred to five hundred barrels of whisky a day. Those distilleries are the beneficiaries of an army of officers, who are paid $5,000,000 a year, and who go about hunting up and arresting the most ignorant and poverty-stricken people throughout the States of Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, West Virginia, Kentucky, and other portions of the country on the most technical grounds.

Seeing that the tax was not going to be paid; seeing that from time to time whisky rings received the privileges which they desired, to wit: first, extension for sixty days; then, second, extension of the bonded paried for distilled spirits for one year by a promise to pay interest:

period for distilled spirits for one year by a promise to pay interest; third, extension for three years without interest; then repeal of stamp taxes; after that the leakage clause of seven and a half gallons per barrel; then still further extension, in defiance of the action of Congress, for six months by a regulation of the Treasury Department which was without warrant of law.

On April 13 and 15, 1882, I called the attention of Congress to the insatiate demands of the whisky ring as follows:

Mr. Chairman, the Republicans of this House held a solemn caucus here and declared as Republicans, and published our actions to the public, that we would not reduce the tax on whisky from 90 to 50 cents a gallon, but in less than a fortnight the Committee on Ways and Means, for some unknown purpose, brought in a bill which was better for the large distiller and the bonded-ware-house man than would have been a reduction of the tax from 90 cents to 50 cents a gallon on whisky. This is a beautiful record to go before the country with, as accessories to the schemes of the Democratic party and renegade Republicans.

Now, observe that on November 1, 1881, there were 67,442,185 taxable gallons of spirits remaining in distillery warehouses, or more than the total amounts for the three years preceding 1881. But, sir, on the 1st of March, 1882, there were 69,243,835 gallons in distillery warehouses in three States alone—Kentucky, Maryland, and Pennsylvania.

The enormous profits realized under the Carlisle bill are not enough to satisfy the whisky kings. This success under three years' protection and gross indulgence makes them supercitious in demanding as a right the continuance of the policy adopted by the Democratic party.

Why, sir, I remember when in the Forty-fourth Congress the Democratic party, with thirty-two smelling committees, were night and day studying how to turn out public officials, cut down the salaries of poorly-paid clerks, cut off loyal claims, turning out one-armed and one-legged soldiers, and crippling and starving every branch of the Government to seem to save $40,000,000 in order to make a record before the country as great economists and retrenchers and reformers.

Even the boss salary-grabber from Pennsylvania, the late Speaker RANDALL, joined in the Democratic war-whoop of "retrenchment and reform."

Now, I charge that under the operation of the old Carlisle bill every useful industry in the country has been badly damaged, and more than $40,000,000 of money which should have gone into the public Treasury have been given away to the large manufacturers and owners of distilled spirits. And now the perpetutors of this great wrong ask Republicans to become accessories to their criminal legislation, and to "show our faith by our works"—on the devil's side—by extending the bonded period indefinitely and pro rata "outage" for five years beyond the provisions of that Carlisle bill.

Why, sir, that bill extended the time from one to three years, and stopped charging for warehouse stamps (an item amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars), also the charge of 5 per cent. interest formerly collected for all time over one year allowed in bond, and allowed shrinkage from one to seven and one-half gallons, according to time in bond. I assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that the Government lost more dollars by that Carlisle bill than the Forty-fourth Congress saved by its parsimony, and that its evil effects on the useful industries have been as harmful as the temporary Democratic ascendency was pernicious.

Now we Republicans are asked to condone this Bourbon Democratic legislation, and besides sanctioning what they have done to extend the bonded period five years longer, and allow five gallons for "outage" under the new law in addition to the seven and one-half gallons spirited away under the old law. Nor does it stop there. In the machinery of the extension bill passed by the House is a speculating scheme for special bonded warchouses which are to reap a harvest by storage charges imposed on small distillers, who are forced to remove their spirits to such special bonded warchouses which are to reap a harvest by storage charges imposed on small distillers, who are emergency.

Its mission is to develop the vast latent agricultural and mineral resources of our growing and prosperous country; to encourage honest, industrious, and decent immigrants to come and find homes among us; and to enact laws to prohibit the criminals, vagabonds, and moral lepers from touching our shores or desecrating our free institutions.

If the Treasury Department can extend the bonded period six months it may extend it indefinitely.

After six years' experience in Congress I am prepared to say that in my humble judgment more can be done to prevent the use of alcoholic liquors as a beverage by a total abolition of the internal-revenue system, with all of its machinery, than in any other way; and I therefore favor a remission of the vexed question to the several Congressional districts of the United States for settlement as shall seem to each of them wisest and best.

In conclusion, I beg to repeat to the House and to remind the country that the most fruitful source of crime, misery, poverty, and demoralization known to this country is due to the use of intoxicating liquors, and that the responsibility of correcting the evil rests with the people, first in their homes, then in the States, and finally in Congress and the Territories.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for the purpose of submitting a privileged question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield for that pur-

SPEECH

HON. BYRON M. CUTCHEON. OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 3, 1885,

On the bill (S. 2530) to authorize an additional appointment on the retired-list of the Army.

Mr. CUTCHEON said:

Mr. Speaker: I am glad of the opportunity to vote to place General Grant upon the retired-list of that Army which more than any other living man he has rendered illustrious.

Whatever other names may live, whatever other names may perish in the annals of this land, the place of U. S. Grant is fixed in history as securely as that of Alexander, Casar, Bonaparte, or Wellington. He was the one general of our Army who always brought victory with him.

He came to Donelson, and Buckner surrendered. He appeared before Vicksburg, and Pemberton and his thirty thousand became prisoners of war.

He came to our beleaguered Army at Chattanooga, and Mission Ridge and Lookout Mountain became at once and forever the synonym of glorious victory.

He came to the ever-gallant but often-baffled Army of the Potomac, and he never relaxed his iron grip upon the enemies of the Union until hesent them to their homes the paroled prisoners of the great Republic.

Victorious in battle, he was magnanimous in victory. His triumph was not more welcome to his friends and to the friends of the Union than was his magnanimity grateful and unexpected to the vanquished. The Revolution had but one Washington, the civil war can have but one Grant. By the side of the names of Washington and Lincoln the name of Grant will ever stand, one of the grand triumvirate of the first century of the Republic. No honors that we have paid and no benefactions that we can render can ever outmeasure the greatness of the obligation we owe him in the few remaining years of his life. There were single days when the value of the services of General Grant would outweigh them all. To say that General Grant has committed errors in both military and civil life is simply to say that he is human.

To say that his business disasters have been sad is simply to say that no man is equally great in all directions; and it appeals all the more strongly to our sense of gratitude for the great services rendered by him in the hour of our greatest need.

But above all errors and above all disasters he stands the great, heroic figure of this generation, the envoy of victory, the hero of Vicksburg and of Appomattox, the conqueror of peace, and the restorer of a reunited country.

We owe it to him, we owe it not less to ourselves, we owe it alike to the past and to coming generations, that neither the critic of the present nor the historian of the future shall be able to say, pointing to General Grant, that republics are ungrateful.

Let us then, forgetting all resentments, burying all animosities, foregoing all criticism, recognize in General Grant the embodiment of the spirit of patriotism and heroic sacrifice which made this second century of the great Republic possible.

General Grant.

"Gratitude is the curse of republics."

SPEECH

HON. WHARTON J. GREEN,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 3, 1885,

On the bill (S. 2530) to authorize an additional appointment on the retired-list of the Army.

Mr. GREEN said:

Mr. GREEN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: At the risk of being thought churlish or ungracious, or of other imputation of motive, I am impelled by sense of duty to raise my voice and enter protest against the passage of the bill under consideration. I but anticipate the charge of sectional hostility which such opposition is sure to engender. Full well I know that the motives of any hailing from my quarter of our common country who dare oppose this and kindred measures are liable to misconstruction and certain of vituperation.

But, sir, no man is worthy to occupy a seat on this floor who permits himself to be tongue-tied by such puerile, personal considerations. God knows I am actuated by no latent sentiment of lingering hate in opposing this and kindred measures. Neither do I believe that others like situated are so actuated.

Brave men bear no malice after a fair fight, an honest hand-shake, and a genuine make-up. The opposite is equally certain. The skulker and the deserter, the bounty-jumper and the contractor, the homeguard, the blackguard, and the demagogue—all of whom, like the warhorse in Holy Writ, snuff the battle from afar—are implacable in hate, even twenty years after guns are grounded and sabers sheathed. Every side in every struggle turns out these valiant mouthers and strutters; side in every struggle turns out these valiant mouthers and strutters; harmless as doves in war, but mischievous as serpents in peace, or, as John Phœnix has it, "soldiers in peace, citizens in war." But take "the soldiers" in our terrific strife, and I venture to say that since the first recorded battle between brothers in the purlieus of Paradise never was there such deadly hate in battle or such mutual rubbing of eyes and genuine forgiveness after the smoke of battle was dispelled. It is an English attribute, and we are English. The sword-wearers and the gun-bearers on the victor side held out the right hand of fellowship and said, "Let us be brothers again." After such a pass at arms none but heroes could do it, and none but men imbued with the spirit of freedom could say it. And may I not be pardoned for adding that none have ever accepted the dread arbitrament of battle with more composure and less complaint than the losing side, of which I was but an humble component, derided as rebels and belied as traitors by heroic "implacables" of genus named?

They dared, endured, and for opinion suffered as no mailed host has ever done as long as the clash of arms continued. But when "grimvisaged war had smoothed his wrinkled front," they went back to their desolated hearth-stones bearing little of this world's gear, and leaving even their hate behind.

As one of that fold, realizing full well that the cherished convictions of earlier years are dead and buried, but as an American citizen, and as a lawmaker, too, still wedded to the free traditions of my forebears, I as a lawmaker, too, still wedded to the free traditions of my forebears, I venture to raise my voice, unattuned to eloquence, in honest and earnest protest against this unprecedented proposition. It is not done in the spirit of malediction of a confederate soldier, but of an American legislator. It is uttered in no carping spirit of reprisal or revenge for blasted hopes and dream dispelled by the would-be beneficiary. So far from it, Mr. Speaker, that were I his bosom friend, regard for his fair fame and good name would prompt even more strenuous hostility to this ill-advised step of his injudicious friends. For, sir, is it not an imputation upon the honor of the leading soldier of the victorious side to infer that he would take a service pension (and, say what you will, it is nothing more or less) while one is refused even to a meritorious drummer boy, whose rat-a-tat sounded charge or checked retreat in the great armies which he led? What better right the first man than the last man to a service pension? And I repeat, disguise it as you will, it is but such.

It were invidious to give to the first and withhold from the second, and so on to the last. Carried out to its legitimate conclusion, and so far from being cursed with a redundant revenue and overplethoric Treasury, as we now are, unless we curtailed our prohibitory tariff on many articles, there would soon be a lamentable deficiency. There is nothing like a fat pension-roll to make a lean treasury.

Good soldiers in war, synonym in time of peace for good citizens, are, I am sure, opposed to such a wholesale, bankrupting spoliation bill as one for general service pensions imports.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the passage of this bill, ay, its introduction, subjects the recipient of its benefits to the imputation of avarice, the subjects the recipient of its benefits to the imputation of avarice, the besetting sin of senility and littleness, from which true greatness has ever been supposed to be exempt. Of a surety, Mr. Speaker, it is not the soldier vice. "On the contrary, quite the reverse." For near two hundred years we read of no great English speaking soldier who has tarnished his epaulets or his escutcheon with greed of gain. Ay, Mr. Speaker, since the great Marlborough, "little Jack Churchill," bartered a sister's honor, not to speak of his own, for pounds, pence, and promotion, a soldier with "an itching palm" has been the scoff and scorn of soldiers. There has been there may be there will be free. promotion, a soldier with "an itening paim" has been the scorf and scorn of soldiers. There has been, there may be, there will be, free-lances and soldiers of fortune, who are willing to pit blood 'gainst bounty, and who demand equivalent after, whether the first was spilt or simply endangered. It is simply a question of "barter" with Capt. Dugald Dalgetty. But while barter may be pardonable in a Shylock, where even a pound of live human flesh is involved, it is sickening, it is nauseating in a nation's idol, where the consideration is but an atom

Fancy him to whom you proud pile was but yesterday completed, standing like suppliant or mendicant in yonder aisle, either in person or by proxy, hat in hand and begging recognition for service rendered. Had the abject picture ever been presented to a country's scorn the shaft had never been erected. Such was the claim of Sulla, "the manslayer," who would throttle country and silence conscience to gain that which he most desired.

Aurelius, the grandest figure in ancient story, did not, he could not have done it. Aristides was a citizen of Athens, and had rendered some service to the State. He died, the purse-bearer of the State. He lived in penury and died a pauper, and was buried by charity, and yet no prince of recorded time has had his epitaph, and but few deserved it—the briefest, proudest, grandest ever chiseled by stone-worker.

Apposite to the bill, Mr. Speaker, candor compels the confession that last session did tax my constitutional conscience to its utmost tension to vote for a kindred but I think much more meritorious measure.

To give its claims in brief:
Some forty years ago a President called for an army to uphold the honor of his country. The call was answered, honor was upheld, and more than an empire added. The roll of heroes who did it had dwindled down to a fraction. Borne down with wounds, and poverty, and age, this band of superannuated heroes did venture to ask an obolus of their country. I tried to say "No," but it was not in me to do it. A Democratic House with singular unanimity accorded it. A Re-

A Democratic House with singular unanimity accorded it. A Republican Senate thought proper to kill it with a rider. Now, sir, if these old veterans who had given us a foothold on the Pacific and extended our sway from ocean to ocean, worn down with years, and tottering on the brink of the grave, are not entitled to the poor pittance asked for, upon what principle of equity or propriety can younger soldiers in later wars expect a recognition of their service in the manner suggested in this bill? in this bill ?

Judged from the successful standpoint, no man can overrate the magnitude of the work he accomplished; but, I repeat, let us not, for his own sake as well as ours, insult him with a pecuniary recompense. Ay, let us not measure his merit by the metallic standard. Merit so measured is apt to dwindle in public esteem; to grow dim instead of brighter with advancing years. 'Tis an old saying: "Republics are ungrateful;" but of all men who have lived or died, none has less right to complain of the ingratitude of republics than he.

Perhaps had my lot been cast on this side of the Potomac instead of the other I might add that few have illustrated in their own person the force of the antithetical aphorism, "Gratitude is the danger, the curse of republics."

Better the Ostra of Athens or the Tarpeia of Rome to curb the undue and dangerous popularity of a favorite than the gratitude which would prompt a free state to establish a pernicious precedent in his behalf.

Mr. Speaker, I believe I am within bounds in saying that with the exception of two or three of his retiring Presidential predecessors, so far from their being men of wealth, there was not one of them that could be called moderately well off. The list includes the Sage of Monticello, author of the Declaration of Independence, and coadjutor of the bill of rights, and by common consent the wisest political thinker of the New World, if not of the world. He died almost in penury and left his family destinte. family destitute.

And there was his neighbor, Madison, deep, learned, didactic, and abstruse, whose counsels had most contributed to shape that inspired abstruse, whose counsels had most contributed to snape that inspired instrument, revered by our sires next to the Bible, the Constitution of our country. He, too, died a poor man. They both had a neighbor, who was called to the same exalted post which they had filled. He it was who dared to flaunt in the faces of the potentates of the Old World his "doctrine," which, considering the time, would be thought impudent if it were not sublime, and made by force of public sentiment the recognized "doctrine" of all his successors. He died among ment the recognized "doctrine" of all his successors. He died among strangers, and there too was he buried, for reason why, he left not the wherewith to pay hearse-hire back to his loved Virginia. Virginia brought him home and gave him a cubit of earth.

And after a pause stalks on and off the Presidential stage that sturdy, self-poised, self-reliant, and unbending nature, most aptly called "Old Hickory," who left his impress on his age and the age succeeding and the ages to succeed as few have done in the annals of time. He lived up to his salary in generous but unpretentious hospitality, as a gentleman President should, and went out a poorer man than when he entered. Each and all they served their country well, and died without a blot.

man President should, and went out a poorer man than when he entered. Each and all they served their country well, and died without a blot. In dire need, did either pray for pension? Woe had it been to injudicious friend had one dared done so for them. They were as poor but as proud as Scotch lords, and would have taken tendered bounty, from what source coming, as unpardonable affront.

Mr. Speaker, I do not underrate or decry either of their legitimate successors. But in the presence of this august body I dare swear that if they were not entitled to pecuniary recompense none other since has been. If they would have scorned it with disdain the propriety of any who have filled the high office which they adorned, asking for recognition of service rendered, may well be doubted.

who have filled the high olince which they adorhed, asking for recogni-tion of service rendered, may well be doubted.

The world has lately had cause to hope that he too was of the Cato-nian school. It was but the other day that the world was startled and his true friends delighted to read the head-line in the telegraphic col-umn, "He declines;" and a few days later, "He declines again." It had been proposed by the highest recommendatory source to put him on the pension-list, but he declined with ungracious if not overzeal.

on the pension-list, but he declined with ungracious if not overzeal. Zealous friends started to raise another large fund for his benefit; but he declined again. A wealthy friend offers to tear up a hundred-and-fifty-thousand-dollar mortgage in his behalf, but again the proposition is vetoed. Even his enemies were forced to cry, "Brave!" It is for him to say whether his enemies shall say, with show, "The previous baits were inadequate; a shark is never caught with a sardine hook." In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I ask this House through you if this great soldier is fit and meet object of charity? Unless he is belied he is the recipient of an annual income—placed by the considerate care of friends who gave it beyond even the reach of his honest creditors, and that is where no honest man should wish to have his money placed—greater than that enjoyed by either of his predecessors. If injudicious speculation or financiering has entailed upon him loss, whether that loss be the result of cupidity or overconfidence in another, be his the blame and be his the penalty. Thousands to-day are paying the penalty attaching to misplaced confidence in a wild-cat concern whose only basis of credit was his own great name, not for finance, but for Government patronage.

My sympathy, Mr. Speaker, is more with the confiding fools who fondly trusted that an institution paying 3 per cent. a month to the head of the firm was a fit depository for honest savings. Are these victims to be satisfied out of the amount asked for? Then add a cipher to the sum demanded and it will pay them a bare I per cent, per annum on their confidence deposits in that model banking-house. In the absence of specific statement by the framers of the bill we are constrained to believe that such purpose is foreign to the pension. But were it otherwise, I would still vote "no." "If that be treason," or to employ the post bellum euphemism, "disloyalty," any who please can make the most of it. I for one do not propose to stifle my conscience to prove my loyalty.

General Grant.

SPEECH

HON. THOMAS J. HENDERSON,

OF ILLINOIS.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 3, 1885,

On the bill (S. 2530) to authorize an additional appointment on the retired-list of the Army.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I have no disposition to discuss the merits of the bill

Mr. Speaker: I have no disposition to discuss the merits of the bill to restore General Grant to the Army and place him on the retired-list with the rank and pay of General. If any man in this or any other age ever merited so distinguished an honor as this bill proposes to confer, it is General Ulysses S. Grant, and I believe it to be a reproach to the Republic which he contributed so much to save that the conferring of such honor upon him has been so long delayed.

I have no sympathy with those who stop to inquire into the income or the necessities of General Grant in the consideration of this bill, whether they favor or oppose its passage. If this bill is passed, as I earnestly hope it will be, it should be placed on higher ground, ground which is more honorable to the nation and to General Grant, than that of his misfortunes or his necessities. I wish in my heart the honor now proposed by this bill had been conferred upon General Grant with less reluctance, and when he was in the full vigor of his health and there was no question as to his necessities. It would have been far more honorable to him and to the country which he has served with more honorable to him and to the country which he has served with

so much distinction.

It will be remembered that in the Forty-seventh Congress a bill to place General Grant upon the retired-list of the Army passed the Senate and was referred by the House to the Committee on Military Affairs, of which I was then chairman. That bill was never reported back to the House by the committee. But it is due to myself and to some other members of the committee to say that we earnestly desired to report the bill back favorably to the House, and when a majority of the committee decided otherwise we prepared a minority report, but as the majority of the committee did not make a report to the House we were unable to present our views as the minority of the committee. And as the report then prepared and signed by Hon. Anson G. McCook, Hon. George R. Davis, Hon. Henry J. Spooner, and myself, members of the Committee on Military Affairs, briefly presents the reasons which controlled us in favoring the passage of the bill, I ask that the same may be incorporated into and made part of my remarks. It is as follows: porated into and made part of my remarks. It is as follows:

us in favoring the passage of the bill, I ask that the same may be incorporated into and made part of my remarks. It is as follows:

Mr. Henderson, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following as the views of the minority:

The undersigned, members of the Committee on Military Affairs, to which committee was referred Senate bill 59, to place Ulysses S. Grant, late General and ex-President of the United States, upon the retired-list of the Army, beg leave, in connection with the unfavorable report of the majority of the committee, to submit the following views of the minority:

Without intending to offer at any great length the reasons which induce us to favor the passage of said Senate bill, we are of the opinion that the distinguished services of General Grant during the late war of the rebellion are of such high character as to entitle him to the recognition by the Government which said bill proposes to make. Surely but few men, if any, in the history of the world have served their country with greater distinction and honor than Ulysses S. Grant did during the late war for the preservation of the Union.

Educated by his country as a soldier, when internal war threatened to overthrow the Government he at once offered his services to the governor of his State, and, beginning his career as colonel of an Illinois regiment, found himself at the close of the war at the head of the Army, with the highest military rank and distinction known to the country, and which should be dear to the hearts of the American people as long as they shall be animated by a love of noble deeds and great achievements. And yet no recognition, we believe, has ever been made of the distinguished services of General Grant by the Government of the United States, which he did so much to preserve, further than a vote of thanks by Congress.

It is true a patriotic and grateful people twice elected him to the high and honorable office of President of the United States. But while that office is one of great honor, it is

SPEECH

HON. STROTHER M. STOCKSLAGER.

OF INDIANA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 3, 1885,

On the bill (S. 2530) to authorize an additional appointment on the retired-list of the Army.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: No man will go further than I will in according to General Grant due meed of praise for his great services to the country as a leader of our armies in the late war. I shall not seek to detract a single laurel from his brow, for whatever individuals may think, the civilized world has decreed and the future historian will accord to him blood, to bestow large sums upon any person, simply because misfortune has overtaken them or they are upon beds of sickness. We should not legislate upon any such principle.

upon what grounds do the friends of this measure place it? It is hardly claimed, and certainly has not been demonstrated to this House, that General Grant is in need of this aid. Indeed, it is quite certain he is not. Mr. George W. Jones, editor of the New York Times, in a statement published in the New York Herald of November 30, 1884, after the financial misfortunes of General Grant had overtaken him,

used the following language:

It has been extensively circulated that the literary work of General Grant was all that the ex-President had to live upon during the coming years of his life, and therefore an interview was sought with George Jones, editor and proprietor of the New York Times, to whose exertions the raising of a trust fund of $250,000 in behalf of General Grant some years back was almost entirely due. Mr. Jones in a business-like way responded to all pertinent queries.

"I'll tell you all about this," said Mr. Jones, "When the fund of $250,000 was complete, desiring to invest it in some permanent and safe way, I counseled with ex-Governor Morgan, who advised that it be invested in Wabash stock. I suggested that perhaps Governments would be better, as I could put it where a certainty of 6 per cent. per annum could be returned. The Governor explained to me that his suggestion applied to a section only of the Wabash road, which involved an investment only of some $2,000,000, from which the income was almost a certainty.

to me that his suggestion applied to so, 200,000, from which the income was almost a certainty.

"For what, said I, would you guarantee the income?"

"He replied that for 5 per cent, he would guarantee $15,000 a year for ten consecutive years. Whereupon I made the arrangement."

"Has that been regularly paid?"

"It has, down to date."

"Without exception?"

"Well, there was one time when it was not paid for a few weeks, but, upon the representation that it would be paid—as it since has been—we did not press the estate of Governor Morgan for the guarantee. It is arranged between the executors, as it was with Governor Morgan, that in default of the payment by the road the principal and interest should be returned to us in behalf of General Grant. That is as certain as anything can be in life. The original fund can not be touched and the per annum income is assured."

"Of one thing the public may be certain—the money was raised by Grant's friends for Grant. It has been safely invested, and its income is abundantly guaranteed. It was raised for Grant and Grant alone will have it.

From this uncontradicted statement it seems General Grant has an assured annual income of $15,000. Quite enough, I take it, for the comfortable support of himself and family. Then upon what other ground is it based? It must be sympathy and nothing more. But, sir, if I am called upon to legislate in favor of the objects of my sympathy, it will be for the poor wounded and disabled soldier who is in poverty and distress, and is unable to keep the "wolf of starvation" away from his door, and the widows and orphans of such brave soldiers as went down door, and the widows and orphans of such brave soldiers as went down to death in defense of their country, who for years have been knocking at the doors of Congress and of your Pension Office, but who, on account of some technicality of the law, or some inabilty, perhaps on account of poverty, to make the necessary proof, are denied the little pittance for which they so humbly beg, and to which they are so justly entitled, but notwithstanding are permitted to go down to death feeling that a great injustice has been done them. ing that a great injustice has been done them.

Sir, if the rules of this House must be suspended, in the name of the classes to which I have referred let us take up and pass the bill inclasses to which I have referred let us take up and pass the bill increasing the pensions of widows and orphans from $8 to $12 per month, dispense with the proof of prior soundness, repeal the limitation to the arrears-of-pensions law, pension the old veterans of the Mexican war, and thus make smooth the path of these poor, dependent, and helpless persons as they pass down the declivity of life into the "valley and shadow of death." They would not only be acts which appeal to our sympathies, but they are acts which are demanded by every consideration of justice and good faith, and are entirely in accord with the settled Policy of the Government.

But I have a more serious objection than this to the placing of General Grant upon the retired-list of the Army.

It is a civil pension. General Grant is just as much a civilian to-day as General Rosecrans or General Slocum, who are honored members of this House. They are both brave and noble soldiers, and performed valiant and distinguished military services for their country, but to grant them a pension or to place them upon the retired-list would be simply a civil pension or a retired-list for civilians. To this I am most earnestly opposed. I think it a dangerous precedent and one to which I can never give my sanction.

I have uniformly opposed all such cases. I had the honor of making I have uniformly opposed all such cases. I had the honor of making the first extended speech ever made in the American Congress against the anti-American, anti-republican principle of civil pensions. I opposed with all my might granting a pension to Mrs. Meikleham, Thomas Jefferson's granddaughter, who was said to be living upon the charity of friends, because of the dangerous principle involved. I also opposed placing General Pleasonton and General Averill who, it was alleged, and I doubt not truthfully, were forced to resign and did not leave the Army of their own accord, because of the same principle. And having made my record, I can not permit my sympathies or the appeals and clamors of the public to deter me from performing my

The American people duly appreciated General Grant's military services, and revived for him the rank which was created for Washington; a rank which he might have held and enjoyed all the emoluments bea rank which he might have held and enjoyed all the emoluments belonging to it during his life had he chosen to do so. But his political ambition led him into another field. He voluntarily gave up this exalted life position, which the people in their generosity and out of gratitude for his services gave him, and took the position of Chief Magistrate of the country, which he held for eight years, when he retired to private life and became once more a private citizen. This is certainly all the honor which any man could ask and all the country could give. Placing Country when the retired life rill give him are additional. ing General Grant upon the retired-list will give him no additional honor, but will establish a precedent which will work incalculable mischief in the future.

Therefore, much as I appreciate General Grant's achievements, which are a part of the country's heritage, and deeply as I sympathize with him in his losses and his illness, I can not lend my voice or my vote to a measure which will give him no additional honor and nothing that he really needs, but will be another step in the direction of a civil pension-list such as England is to-day groaning under.

The Public Lands—Squandered on Railroad and other Corpora-tions—Forfeiture of unearned Land Grants demanded by the People, but refused.

SPEECH

HON. STROTHER M. STOCKSLAGER,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 2, 1885,

On the disposition of the public lands.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: For the second time in the history of our country the question of the disposition of the public lands has become a great overshadowing question. That question is now one upon which public opinion is greatly absorbed, and which is attracting more attention among thoughtful persons than any other public question which is now being agitated. And, Mr. Speaker, when we pass in review the history of the land question and the land systems of the countries of the Old World, its influence upon the patriotism and prosperity of the people and upon civilization, we can not wonder that the public mind when once aroused upon this great question will brook no delay, but dewhen once aroused upon this great question will prook no delay, but demands that the most effective, rapid, and powerful remedies shall be applied to the change of the policy pursued by this Government for the last twenty years. The people demand that the fearful engine of the decimation and squandering of our public lands—granting them in large bodies to great corporations—shall be reversed, and we shall at once return to the true policy of the Government, the granting of the public land without cost in small quantities to actual settlers public land without cost, in small quantities, to actual settlers.

Mr. Speaker, I say it is the second time in the history of our country that this question has loomed up until it is considered one of transcendent importance. As far back as 1849 it was a prominent question in American politics. In that year, on the 24th day of December, the first homestead bill was introduced in the House by Hon. Stephen A. Douglas, and a similar bill was introduced in the Senate on the 7th day of January, 1850, by Andrew Johnson. The agitation of the subject continued, and such measures were supported by such able and distinguished legislators as Douglas, Pendleton, Vallandigham, Holman, and S. S. Cox.

When the Republican party met in national convention at Chicago in 1860 and put forth its platform, conspicuous among its principles therein enunciated was the following resolution:

That we protest against any sale or alienation to others of the public lands held by actual settlers, and against any view of the homestead policy which regards the settlers as paupers or suppliants for public bounty; and we demand the passage by Congress of the complete and satisfactory homestead measure which has already passed the House.

Thus recognizing the bill passed by the Democrats in the House as the correct principle upon the subject of public lands.

It is a part of the political history of the country that the Republican party was successful in that campaign, electing its President and securing control of Congress. It carried out its pledge to the people by the enactment of a homestead law. This was a beneficent law, and I am frank to confess that if it had been carried out in good faith and the principles contained in it applied for all time to our public domain, it would have been one of the greatest and most far-reaching measures ever enacted by a legislative assembly on earth. Considered in its effects upon the future of the country, while the Republic stands, it was of transcendent importance. of transcendent importance.

The peaceful repose of our country was soon disturbed by the clash The peacetal repose of our country was soon disturbed by the clasm of arms, and the attention of the great body of our people was so riveted upon that terrible conflict, which was to decide whether or not the Government should live, that the subject of the public lands was for years little thought of by the people.

But alas, sir, the representatives of the people, who had obtained power upon a pledge to apply the beneficent principles of the homestead law to the public domain, and while the people were lulled into repose by the passage of the law and their attention drawn away from the subject by the horrors of civil war, in violation of their pledges to the people and in betrayal of a high trust began a reckless and whole-sale system of giving away the public lands that before had never been dreamed of.

The American people were amazed when they learned that on the 1st day of July, 1862, just forty-one days after the homestead law was approved, the same Congress, with a reckless disregard of their own action never before witnessed, granted to the Union and Central Pacific Rail-roads a magnificent belt of land forty miles wide, extending from the Missouri River to near the Bay of San Francisco, and containing, to the Union Pacific 16,115,000 acres and to the Central Pacific 15,260,000 acres.

Thus the homestead law, by which the millions of acres of unsettled land was pledged to the people as a heritage to the actual settlers—to the men of toil who would cultivate them and make them blossom and bloom and bear fruit-was violated, disregarded, and set aside, and a most gigantic system of reckless squandering of the lands inaugurated. This was an entire change in our land system, both in the manner of disposing of the public lands and of the amounts to be given. Before that date not a single acre of the public domain was ever granted to a railroad or other corporation. Donations of the public lands had been made from time to time to the States, aggregating in all 31,600,846 acres, for the purpose of being disposed of by the States in aid of education, for military roads, for internal improvements, and for railroads. But the grants were all to the States.

The first grant to a State for railroad purposes was to the State of Illinois, in 1850, for the Illinois Central Railroad, and was of the saved Illinois, in 1850, for the Illinois Central Railroad, and was of the saved sections, six sections in width on each side of the road. That State in making the grant to the railroad wisely reserved to herself 7 per cent. of the gross earnings of this road, from which she is now deriving nearly a half million dollars annually, and which will for all time to come contribute largely to the expense of the State government. The grants which followed up to 1862 were generally limited to six sections per mile, and in most cases the sale of the land was restricted to actual settlers of one hundred and sixty acres each at $2.50 per acre.

As before remarked, until the Republican party came into power not an acre of the public lands had ever been granted to a railroad or other corporation.

The Republican party inaugurated a new policy, and it was kept up by that party until we find in round numbers 200,000,000 acres of the public domain granted to railroad corporations. It is difficult for the mind to grasp this vast quantity.

mind to grasp this vast quantity.

We see a belt eighty miles wide, extending from near Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean, covering some of the best agricultural, pasture, and timber lands in the country, that has been granted to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. Then we see a belt forty miles in width, from the Missouri River to near the Bay of San Francisco, held by the Union and Central Pacific Railroad Companies. Near the Pacific coast we see a belt extending longitudinally through California, owned by the Western and Southern Pacific Companies, which, as is well known, is owned and controlled by the same parties that own and control the Central Pacific. And we see a belt, forty miles wide, stretching through Kansas into Colorado and New Mexico toward Arizona and old Mexico, that is represented by the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad Company. Then another belt, eighty miles in width, extending across New Mexico and Arizona to near the Pacific, represented by the Atlantic and Pacific Company, being substantially the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Company.

There are but a vortion of the grand helts of country covered by

These are but a portion of the grand belts of country covered by these enormous grants.

The mind is staggered in an effort to contemplate this imperial estate granted to great corporations. It can only be grasped by comparison. You could carve out of it 1,250,000 homesteads of one hundred and sixty acres each. It is equal to two hundred and forty States the size of Rhode Island. It is equal in area to seven States like Pennsylvania, with her 45,215 square miles; four and one-half times as large as all the New England States; equal to the thirteen original States, which have 204,001,280 acres. The total area of Great Britain and Ireland is 74,137,600 acres, or but little more than one-third these grants. There is not among all the enlightened nations of modern Europe one that has an area which equals that of our railroad kings.

that has an area which equals that of our railroad kings. The empire of Austro-Hungary and the kingdom of Italy, with Switzerland and the Netherlands added, have an area of only 250,012,720 acres.

The creation by law of this most gigantic land monopoly the world has ever seen must in the very nature of things be felt upon our institutions and upon our people. The example of the Federal Government has been followed by some of our States, which have granted millions of acres of their public lands to railroad corporations, or sold them in large bodies to individuals. All the barriers have been thrown down, and foreign and domestic capitalists have been reading a rich down, and foreign and domestic capitalists have bean reaping a rich harvest for themselves in the purchase of vast areas of land. But so far as the people are concerned, they, through their unworthy representatives, have sown the wind, and they are destined to reap the Land monopoly has been the curse of every country in the world where it has obtained. The people of the Old World have struggled for hundreds of years in vain and futile attempts to get back to a rational system of land holdings. The happy and contented Russian villagers who were made slaves by the great landlords have struggled for lagers who were made slaves by the great landfords have struggled for centuries to get back to their old system, and although their lot is now much improved, it is far from being desirable. England ever since she adopted the old feudal system, upon the invasion by the Normans, has struggled to obtain a rational system of land-holdings. Poor, unhappy Ireland, with her huge estates, is another familiar example. The only true system is that of a division of the land into small tracts among owners who reside upon and cultivate it. The whole world's experience for thousands of years teaches this doctrine, and the nation which has such system to the fullest extent has the most prosperous people. In the proportion in which you reduce the small holdings of land, and as a consequence increase the number of large holders and tenant farmers and agricultural laborers, just in that proportion do you degrade the agriculturist and bring poverty and misery upon him.

Mr. Probyn, in his work entitled, "Systems of Land Tenure in various Countries," in discussing the land system of Ireland and in contemplating what an impartial man familiar with this subject in that country would suggest as reforms, says:

He would probably set aside primogeniture, entails, and strict settlements. On large estates held by corporations he would look with no friendly eye. The "dead hand" fills him with peculiar horror. He everywhere wishes to see the living hand grasping the living soil.

Mr. Francis A. Walker, in his very recent work entitled "Land and its Rent," in discussing the subject of small holdings and the advantages presented by such a system, says:

tages presented by such a system, says:

The "magie of property" in transmuting the bleak rock into the blooming garden, the barren sand of the seashore into the richest mold, has been told by a hundred travelers and economists since Arthur Young's day. In his tireless activity, "from the rising of the lark to the lodging of the lamb," in his unceasing vigilance against every form of waste, in his sympathetic care of the drooping vine, the broken bough, the tender young of the flock and the herd, in his instinate knowledge of the character and capability of every field, and of every corner of every field within his narrow domain, in his passionate devotion to the land which is all his own, which was his father's before him, which will be his son's after him, the peasant, the small proprietor, holds the secret of an economic virtue which even the power of machinery can scarcely overcome.

Let us see what the effect of this ominously wrong system has been

Let us see what the effect of this ominously wrong system has been upon the agriculturists of this country.

The following table exhibits the number of farms of different sizes held in the United States and Territories in 1870 and 1880 respectively:

ber of large farms, they having increased, from 1870 to 1880, 494,566, while the small farms have decreased in number 140,653. This speaks volumes, and to the student of history is a solemn warning, which fills his heart with sadness for the future of our country.

But, Mr. Speaker, we have not only made great land monopolists of corporations, which, as John Randolph, with bitter sarcasm, yet biting truth, declared, "have neither souls to damn nor bodies to kick," but aliens and foreign corporations are gradually absorbing vast tracts of our best lands, until we find that already it is but little trouble to set out a list of owners of an aggregate of more than 20,000,000 of acres in tracts ranging from 5,000 to 5,000,000 each. I append a list of a few of such alien holders. I doubt not a careful examination of the subject would develop a list much more extensive that the one given

In addition to this, Mr. Speaker, we have interlopers, foreigners, and others, without any right whatever, squatting upon and fencing up tracts of thousands of acres of the public lands, and driving from them with shotguns the actual settlers who desire to make a home upon them. So great has this evil become that this House at this session has passed a bill to declare such inclosures a nuisance and providing penalties for thus fencing up the public lands. I append a list, furnished by the Secretary of the Interior in response to a resolution of Congress, which gives such as have been brought to the notice of the Secretary. How many more such cases exist and the thousands of acres included it is impossible to tell:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,

Washington, D. C., January 23, 1884.

Sin: I am in receipt, by your reference, of a letter dated the 16th instant, from Hon. L. E. PAYSON, a member of the Committee on Public Lands of the House of Representatives, in which he asks to be furnished, for the use of the committee, such information and facts as may be in possession of the Department in regard to the alleged evils growing out of the unauthorized fencing of the public lands by individuals and corporations for grazing purposes and for the benefit alone of the parties making the inclosures, as well as suggestions as to a remedy for such evils.

In reply I have the honor to state that the following cases of unlawful fencing of the public domain have been submitted to you by this office with the recommendation that the Attorney-General of the United States be requested to have proper suits instituted to compel the removal of the fences, namely, the inclosure of W. J. Wilson, containing about 40,000 acres of public lands in Kansas and Nebraska, reported to the Department June 2 and October 9, 1883; the tracts fenced by Nichols, Beach & Co., Keith & Hershey, in Lincoln County, Nebraska, containing 1,083.31, 1,413.38, and 380.38 acres, respectively, reported to the Department September 1, 1883; the inclosure of about 5,000 acres of land in Mancos Cañon, Colorado, by John White, reported upon August 25, 1883; the inclosure of Weber Cañon, Colorado, containing about 6,000 acres, by one Alberson, reported upon September 27, 1883; the inclosure of Chick, Browne & Co., containing about 30,000 acres, in Colorado, reported December 17, 1883; and the Brighton Ranch Company's inclosure, containing about 52,000 acres of land in Custer County, Nebraska, reported to the Department, that the proper United States district attorneys have been directed by the Attorney-General to institute suits, as recommended, in all the cases except that of Chick, Browne & Co. Reports have been acreaided the proper district attorney for sa nally for the fencing; and in order to maintain a civil suit it is necessary in the first place to have the ease thoroughly investigated for the purpose of obtaining the exact description of the land inclosed and all facts in regard to the fencing; and then that these facts should be examined by this office, and if deemed sufficient, by this office submitted to the Department, and by the Department to the Attorney-General, and by him to the proper United States district attorney, who is required to examine the facts, prepare the papers, and see that proper service is had upon the parties, after which other long delays are necessarily caused in tourt. During all this time the intruders retain control over the Government lands, and legitimate claimants are prevented from going upon and purchasing the same. When judgment is obtained, if it should be in favor of the Government, its only effect is to compel the parties to remove their fences.

Your attention is respectfully called to my annual report for 1833 (page 30), in which I state, among other things in reference to the subject, that—

"The practice of inclosing public lands by private persons and companies for exclusive use as stock ranges is extensively continued in States and Territories west of the Mississippi River. These ranges sometimes cover several hundred thousand acres. Special agents report that they have ridden many miles through single inclosures, and that the same often contain much fine farming lands.

Reports have been received of the use of violence to intimidate settlers or expel them from the inclosed lands, "A frequent incident to this control of large bodies of land is the acquirement of title by stock-owners to the valleys, water courses, and other especially valuable lands within the inclosures by means of fraudulent or fictitious entries caused to be made under the pre-emption, homestead, and desert-land laws, Investigations of such entries are in progress in several districts.

"I renew the application that an act be passed imposing penalties for the un-

"I renew the application that an act be passed imposing penalties for the unlawful inclosures of public lands, and preventing by force and intimidation legal settlement and entry."

I would therefore suggest that it be recommended to Congress to pass a law making it a penal offense for any person to build or retain a fence, or to commit a trespass on any public land to which he has no claim under the laws of the United States, or to encourage or assist in any way others in building or maintaining fencing, or committing trespasses on said lands.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, March 3, 1884.

DEAR SIE: Referring to our conversation on the subject of foreign companies controlling inclosures of the public lands, I send you the inclosed memorandum, which I think contains the facts you wanted. The land described, with the exception of perhaps a few thousand acres, is all Government land.

Very respectfully, yours,

H. M. TELLER, Secretary,

Hon. L. E. PAYSON, House of Representatives.

The Arkansas Cattle Company have fenced in the following described public land in the States of Colorado and Kansas, viz:

Beginning on the north bank of the Arkansas River, on the line between sections 19 and 20 in township 23 south, range 41 west, and running a northerly direction to section 20 in township 15 south, range 41 west; thence a northwest-crly direction to section 20 in township 15 south, range 44 west; thence a south-west-crly direction to southeast corner of section 36 in township 15 south, range 48 west; thence a southeast corner of section 36 in township 15 south, range 48 west; thence a southeast corner of township 19 south, range 49 west, and thence a southeasterly direction to the bank of the river in section 26; township 22 south, range 46 west of the sixth principal meridian. Also all that other tract or parcel of land being on the south side of the Arkansas River, in Bent County, Colorado, and bounded as follows, viz: Beginning on the south bank of the Arkansas River on the east line of township 23 south, range 42 west, and running south on said township line to the south line of said township; thence west along the south line of said township it; thence west along the south line of said township it in said township, and thence north to the Arkansas River on the north line of section 21 in said townships, or 921,600 acres, embraced in the inclosure.

On March 24, 1884, Secretary Teller sent to the House a supplemental report relative to unlawful fencing of public lands in the State of Nebraska. The report is a special one, made by United States deputy surveyor G. W. Fairchild, Mr. Fairchild says:

port is a special one, made by United States deputy surveyor G. W. Fairchild. Mr. Fairchild says:

The whole country embraced in my contract (Northwestern Nebraska) is occupied and run by capitalists engaged in cattle-raising, who have hundreds of miles of wire fence constructed to inclose all desirable land, including water courses, to form barriers for their cattle and to prevent settlers from occupying the land. They also represent that they have desert and timber claims upon the land they have inclosed. Upon their fences they have posted at intervals notices as follows: "The — who opens this fence had better look out for his scalp." The fences are built often so as to inclose several sections in one stock ranch, and the ranches are joined together from the mountains clear round to the mountains again. Persons going there, intending to settle, are also informed that if they settle on the land the ranchmen will freeze them out; and they will not employ a man who settles on or claims land, and that he can not get employment from any cattle-men in the whole country.

My chief object in addressing you is to report the wholesale destruction of valuable timber on the Government land of this whole region by the cattle-men, who pretend to own and raise it. There are acres after acres of bare stumps, which but a short time ago were growing timber. There were thousands of logs cut during last summer and hauled out to accessible points, to be used for fences, canals, landing-chutes, and houses in Nebraska and Wyoming.

With all the curses which we have heard heaped upon the land system of England and the land monopoly of England and Wales, it is no comparison to our own. The great landholders of England are mere "pygmies" when compared with our "giants." In a recent work entitled "Land and labor in the United States," by William C. Moody, the author, at page 88 of his book, gives the following as the size of English land holdings:

The following is a list of the whole number of land-owners in England and Wales who are possessed of 50,000 and more acres of land each, and the actual amount of their holdings, by which it will be seen that there are but three who own more than 100,000 acres each, and no one has an estate that reaches 200,000

The same author adds:

But in the United States, we have a saw-maker in Philadelphia with his 4,000,000 acres; two butchers in California with 800,000 and more acres; a cattleraiser in New Mexico with his 750,000 acres; and numbers of them in Texas whose acres are counted by hundreds of thousands. In the great Northwest the land holdings for agricultural purposes—for grain, grass, and vegetables—by hundreds, range to 50,000 acres and upward, occupied by tenants, or machinery, or by both. The whole country, from the Mississippi to the Pacific, is dotted—no, they are not dots—is patched with these huge holdings. In comparison with the monopoly of the lands here shown that of the English landlords appears quite insignificant. And yet we are only in the third decade of our movement.

This great absorption of the public lands has gone on with such marvelous and startling rapidity that an examination of the History and Statistics of the Public Domain, just issued from the General Land Office, develops the fact that there remains to-day unoccupied less than 50,000,000 acres of agricultural public lands in the United States, and that includes the irrigable public lands.

Talk about giving the 2,000,000 soldiers who served in the last war one hundred and sixty acres of public land each! Every thinking person knows that the policy of the Republican party has made this wise and beneficent policy utterly impossible, and the pretense by the members of that party that any such thing is contemplated is, in the light of the facts, the sheerest nonsence. The lands which have been wantonly wasted by that party in building up giant land monopolies is sufficient to have given every soldier of all our wars now living and the widows of such as have died one hundred acres of the public domain. There is now left, after the fourteen years of uninterrupted Republican rule, of agricultural land less than one-fourth of an acre each.

But, Mr. Speaker, the Republican party had an opportunity afforded it to repair some of the wrong done the people of the United States in squandering 200,000,000 acres of the public domain upon greedy, grasping railroad corporations. In each grant made a time was fixed within which the roads should be completed. On the 2d day of May, 1882, the time for the completion of the last grant expired.

The time for the completion of the Northern Pacific grant of 47,000, 000 acres expired on the 4th day of July, 1879. Some of the roads were never constructed at all, and many of them were not constructed within the time, but the Supreme Court having decided that these within the time, but the Supreme Court having decided that these grants vested from the beginning in the corporations, and on the for-feiture of the grant an act of Congress is necessary to restore the lands to the public domain, the Departments of the Government treated these grants as still existing, notwithstanding the forfeiture. I present a table from the annual reports of the Secretary of the Interior for 1880-'81, volume 2, page 318, which presents in detail a large number of these grants at that time.

Total number of acres embraced in these grants......

Length in miles of railroads as definitely located......

Number of miles of railroad completed before expiration of grants.....

Such was the condition of these grants when the Forty-seventh Congress assembled in December, 1882. The Republican party had a majority in that body. Already the murmurings of discontent at these immense grants and the demand for the forfeiture of every acre which had not been earned by the building of the roads according to contract were heard throughout the land. Early in January bills were introduced in the House by Judge HOLMAN, Judge COBB, and others, declaring these lands forfeited. That Congress was in session more than twelve months during its existence, and yet not a single acre of that land was forfeited.

That Congress adjourned and nothing was done toward forfeiting these lands which honestly belong to the people, but the great corporations were left in quiet possession of nearly a hundred million acres of land to which they had no shadow of a right. With that party the voice of the great corporations, of monopoly, is greater than the will of the people. It leans for support upon the thousands of corporations which its legislation has built up and fostered at the expense of the people. But the sublimity of cheek necessary to promulgate the following resolution, which appears in the platform of that party adopted at Chicago last year, can only be found in the ranks of that party. Here it is:

The public lands are a heritage of the people of the United States, and should be reserved as far as possible for small holdings of actual settlers. We are opposed to the acquisition of large tracts of these lands by corporations or individuals, especially when such holdings are in the hands of non-resident aliens, and we will endeavor to obtain such legislation as will tend to correct this evil. We demand of Congress the speedy forfeiture of all land grants which have lapsed by reason of non-compliance with acts of incorporation in all cases where there has been no attempt in good faith to perform the conditions of such grants.

unearned grants. And it is a notorious fact that nearly all the opposition to the forfeitures came from that side of the House. Again, although some of the bills passed this House daily in the first session of this Congress, and many of them have been in the Senate for a long time, yet with one or two exceptions none of them have passed that body.

And, Mr. Speaker, the policy of that party is indicated not only by its action in Congress, but the whole country has just been startled to learn that one of the last acts of the retiring Secretary of the Interior has been to engage his whole force for days, and perhaps weeks, in issuing patents to the lands granted to what is known as the "Backbone land grant," in Louisiana, amounting to about 700,000 acres. Bills were pending in Congress at the time for its forfeiture, and an earnest protest signed by Senator Van Wyck, Mr. Cobb, Mr. Hol-Man, Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Henley against issuing such patents. But the protest was unheeded, and the grant has been confirmed by letters

THE RECORD OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

But, Mr, Speaker, let us look at the record of the Democratic party upon this subject. I have already shown that the first homestead bill ever introduced in this House was introduced by Stephen A. Douglas, and the first bill ever introduced in the Senate was by Andrew Johnand the first bill ever introduced in the Senate was by Andrew Johnson, both of whom were at the time leaders in the Democratic party. I have also seen that the Democratic party passed through this House the first homestead bill which was ever passed in it. I have also seen that the Democratic party during the nearly sixty years of its power in the Government never granted an acre of the public lands to a corporation. Hence, when that party surrendered power March 4, 1861, it did so with a homestead bill passed the previous Congress and our magnificent rubble decrease acres to the back of the confidence of the property of the process.

The uniform policy of that party had been to acquire and husband the public lands for the benefit of the Government and the people. The people having decided, at the last election, that the Republican party was unworthy, and elected a large majority of Democrats to this body, it became the duty of that party to respond to the voice of the people and restore to the public domain such of the public lands as were not earned and beyond the reach of forfeiture to the Government, to attempt, in some degree at least, to right the great wrong done them by the Republican party in violation of its pledges, and which it refused to right in the last Congress. How well that party has adhered to its antecedents and kept faith with the people a glance at our Calendar will show. I desire to call the attention of this House and the country to what has been done.

On the 21st day of January, 1884, the following resolution, introduced by Judge Holman, passed this House:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House all the public lands heretofore granted to States and corporations to aid in the construction of railroads, so far as the same are now subject to forfeiture by reason of the non-fulfillment of the conditions on which the grants were made, ought to be declared forfeited to the United States and restored to the public domain.

Resolved, That it is of the highest public interest that the laws touching the public lands should be so framed and administered as to ultimately secure free-hold therein to the greatest number of citizens; and to that end all laws facilitating speculation in the public lands or authorizing or permitting the entry or purchase thereof in large bodies ought to be repealed, and all of the public lands adapted to agriculture (subject to bounty grants and those in aid of education) ought to be reserved for the benefit of actual and bona fide settlers, and disposed of under the provisions of the homestead laws only.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands is hereby instructed to report to the House bills to carry into effect the views expressed in the foregoing resolutions; that said committee shall be authorized to report such bills at any time, subject only to revenue and appropriation bills; and the same shall in like order be entitled to consideration.

This resolution gave the Committee on Public Lands a right to report at any time, and distinctly committed the House to the repeal of the pre-emption and timber-culture laws and the disposal of the public lands to actual settlers under the homestead laws only.

As to the work done by this House during this Congress I refer to the following lists of bills passed by the House and of others reported favorably by the Committee on Public Lands but not yet passed:

Of all these none but the grant to the Texas Pacific, 14,309,760, have passed the Senate and become law. Some others passed the Senate at the present session of the Forty-eighth Congress, but with such amendments as prevented them from receiving the sanction of the House.

The Committee on Public Lands have also favorably reported a bill prohibiting the holding of lands by aliens. The report made by Judge OATES, of Alabama, is a very able document, and presents very cogent reasons for the enactment of the bill into a law. It should be passed; and thus prevent the accumulation of lands in the hands of citizens of other governments who have no interest in our own except to speculate upon lands which should be given to actual settlers.

We have thus seen that while the Democratic party has been true to We have thus seen that while the Democratic party has been true to the people, and as between the people and the great corporations—aggregated capital and monopoly—they have stood by the people, the Republican party has violated its promises, betrayed the people into the hands of the corporations, and then refused them the partial relief which was still in reach and to which they were so justly entitled. And now to make their record still more sinuous they hypocritically declare that they are in favor of the forfeiture of these lands. It is not true, and I warn the people that that party will never forfeit these lands. Their professions in that direction are a mere hollow pretense and a sham.

And now in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to again say that I deem these measures of vast and far-reaching consequence. No man can study the land systems of the different countries of the world, as I have done within the last week, and observe how uniformly for hundreds of years the monopoly of land, the ownership of the land by the few, has brought poverty, misery, and distress, and how the opposite, or the division of the land and its ownership by the many, has had the opposite effect, without feeling deeply the importance of our action upon this subject; that notwithstanding the solemn warnings of history, we are rushing with headlong speed into the very system which has proven so baleful in other countries. Let us take warning and reverse our course ere it is too late.

Post-Office Appropriation Bill.

SPEECH

HON. HENRY H. BINGHAM,

OF PENNSYLVANIA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 10, 1885.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8138) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes—

Mr. BINGHAM said:

Mr. BINGHAM. No; not with reference to the general principles of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Only different as to the rates.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to congratulate the Committee on Appro-Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to congratulate the Committee on Appropriations for their liberal and generous action in the make-up of this appropriation bill, especially with reference to the legislation included and submitted. I regard many of the paragraphs as more than wise and involving radical changes earnestly demanded by the people in the administration of the Department of Posts in this country. Permit me to state that to my mind it is a singular condition of public affairs, Mr. Chairman, that one of the most important committees of this House, the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, after having held their many meetings and formulated their public measures during two sessions of this Congress, should not have been allowed a single day for their discussion before the House.

It is but one of the very limited number of committees that has not been given a day in court for the consideration of their proposed legislation; and we come to this House to-day only after having made an earnest appeal to the gentleman in charge of this appropriation to consent to incorporate on the bill important amendments that should have been deliberated upon in the House and consummated after a full and fair debate, wherein the merits of the measures recommended and the convenience of the people might have had a hearing, and not under the rule be subject to a point of order when we come to consider the bill by paragraphs.

The measure to which I desire principally to refer in the half hour at my disposal is with reference to the change from one-half an ounce to one ounce as the maximum weight for the 2-cent rate. It is well for this House to understand the principle that in the classification of postthis House to understand the principle that in the classification of postages mail letters pay 64 cents a pound under our 2-cent rate; under the 3-cent rate they paid 96 cents a pound. Your newspapers issued from known offices of publication go through the mail at the rate of 2 cents a pound, and it is wisely proposed in this bill that they shall go at the rate of 1 cent per pound—sixty-four cents a pound for letter matter, 2 cents for newspapers; and I think the only bill that the Post-Office Committee has succeeded in carrying through this House during the present Congress was the reduction in the rate of the transportation on transient newspapers carrying them through the mails at 4 cents per transient newspapers, carrying them through the mails at 4 cents per pound, or 1 cent for four ounces, instead of the old rate of 8 cents per pound, or 1 cent for four ounces, instead of the old face of 8 cents per pound.

The third-class matter is composed of circulars, books and general publications, which pay the 8-cent rate. Merchandise transportation pays 16 cents; and it is perhaps proper for me to state here that letter-matter, paying 64 cents per pound, makes the profit or net results to the Government by which the losses on the second, third, and fourth class mail matter are made up. Letter matter, in the collection of the revenues of the Post-Office Department, pays about 56 per cent.

I have made the statement as to the charges for the different rates of matter, in order to bring forcibly before the House the fact that while newspapers can go through the mails at 2 cents a pound sealed communications are charged at the rate of 64 cents a pound. This measure of reduction has not only received the examination of the Post-Office Department but it has been regarded as of so much importance that President Arthur, in his annual message, invited the attention of Congress to the subject.

Permit me to read his recommendation:

I approve the recommendation of the Postmaster-General that the unit of weight in the rating of first-class matter should be one ounce instead of one-half ounce, as it now is. In view of the statistics furnished by the Department it may well be doubted whether the change would result in any loss of revenue; that it would greatly promote the convenience of the public is beyond dispute.

Postmaster-General Gresham, in his last annual report to Congress, went into this subject critically and with great detail. The present Postmaster-General repeats the recommendation of his predecessor, and announces the fact that a change in the minimum basis of weight on letter-matter would be a change largely reaching the convenience of the people. I will read to the House his recommendation:

I renew the recommendation of my predecessor, that the unit of weight in rating letters and sealed packages (first-class matter) be changed from one-half ounce to one ounce.

By careful investigation in several large offices it is found that less than 6 per cent. of all the letters conveyed in the mails exceed half an ounce in weight, It is evident, therefore, that an increase of the unit of weight to one ounce would diminish the revenues but very little, and there is reason to believe this diminution would be more than compensated by the increased postage on small packages, which, heretofore sent as third or fourth class matter, would, in the event of the proposed change, be sealed and sent as first-class matter.

It is also believed the proposed change would result in a material saving of time to post-office clerks, by largely obviating the necessity of examining unsealed packages with a view of detecting written matter, and would diminish the number of losses in small packages, since sealed matter is less liable to loss than that which is unsealed.

This recovers in addition has received the very experience of the proposed change with a view of detecting written matter, and would diminish the number of losses in small packages, since sealed matter is less liable to loss than that which is unsealed.

This measure in addition has received the unanimous approval of your Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads; and had a day been given for the consideration of our bills I am well assured that after intelligent and full discussion this House would have approved the basis of weight in letter matter since 1851. There have been changes on all divisions covering every other classification of mail matter, but weight of letter matter stands to-day as it was enacted in 1851. Her Majesty's Government changed the basis of the weight of letters in 1871, and every succeeding report of the department points with gratification to the general public convenience secured by the change, not only so far as it concerns the demands of the people, but in addition refers to the increased revenues that came to the British service.

We have been instructed this much in the change of postage from 3 cents to 2 cents: that the people when they could give to their correspondence or their communications secrecy determined to accept a respondence or their communications secrecy determined to acceep a higher rate of postage, and sent their circulars or their postal-cardeom-munications through the mails as sealed correspondence. A change from 3 cents to 2 cents made this great inroad on the postal card, namely, the annual increase in the postal card averaged 14 per cent. Immediately upon the going into effect of the 2-cent rate the first year postal cards lost their average 14 per cent. increase, and decreased 4½ per cent. in circulation. They lost 14 per cent. plus 4½ per cent. the first year that the 2 cent rester went into effect.

cent. in circulation. They lost 14 per cent. plus 4½ per cent. the first year that the 2-cent postage went into effect.

There has been no means of determining the inroad that the 2-cent postage made on circular matter. But the Department states it has been immense. Therefore we have been instructed by that change that if you give a fair, cheap rate the people will avail themselves of the benefits of a sealed letter in preference to an open communication.

We to-day carry—that which the gentleman from Texas [Mr.Reagan] fully understands—he long haul of all legal documents, insurance papers, bankers' communications that are weighty; but the moment that it comes to the question of a short distance the rate of postage at 64' cents a pound throws this yast amount of matter into the express comcents a pound throws this vast amount of matter into the express companies, which receive the large benefits that should be diverted to the postal service. It is believed by the Post-Office Department that by the change from the basis of half an ounce to one ounce all this vast matter that to-day is carried the short distance by the express companies would come into the mail, where it properly belongs.

Another point. Sixteen cents a pound is the rate for what is called fourth-class matter—on merchandise. To go into the fourth-class rate the package must be left so open that examination may be made by the postal authorities. It is believed by the Department that a vast amount of this matter (if the rate was made 2 cents an ounce, or 32 cents a pound) instead of 64 cents a pound), that now goes as fourth-class, or mer-chandise, would be diverted also into the mails. And in that connec-tion I desire to make this statement: Out of the losses that the Post-Office Department through their inspectors are called upon to investigate, there are ten losses in fourth-class matter to one loss in any other mail matter. Fourth-class matter, as I have said, is merchandise, and left open under the law. Therefore parts of it can be taken, or often, as is the case in small packages, the clerk or the post-office employé, having a knowledge of the contents of the package, appropriates it. It is believed that a large amount of this matter, if allowed to go through the mails at the 32-cent pound rate, instead of the 64-cent pound rate, would go sealed, and large benefits revert to the Department

There is another matter in connection with this. It is stated by the Postmaster-General in his report, upon an examination that I asked Postmaster-General in his report, upon an examination that I asked for a year ago, and upon a second examination that I asked for in the month of December last, that the large offices of the country endeavored to estimate the actual weight and count the number of letters that exceeded the half-ounce weight. Two tests were made of this—three days a year ago, and three days last December. Those tests resulted in this wise: Six per cent. of the letter matter going through the mails exceeds the half-ounce weight; but 2 per cent. exceeds the half-ounce up to the one ounce. Therefore whatever might be the alleged or claimed loss to the Department by virtue of this change would be small, but 2 per cent. of the weight between the half-ounce and the ounce.

Remember, also, the fact that your revenues from letter matter in the Post-Office Department is 56 per cent. It is believed and confi-dently asserted by the Department that in the first year the increase from the conveyance through the mails of legal documents, bankers' communications, insurance papers, together with the vast amount of fourth-class matter that now goes as merchandise at 16 cents per pound; would not only fully compensate for that loss, but would in addition bring a profit to the Department. That is the judgment of the Department after two careful examinations into this entire subject.

One of the most troublesome questions of accounts in the Department with post-offices is that which is called the due or the underpaid post-with post-offices is that which is called the due or the underpaid postage. You get a letter of average size which turns the scale on half an ounce. You are called on to pay the deficient postage of 2 cents. Those letters go into the big offices, and as they are picked out by the clerks in separating the mail, are thrown aside.

They remain there until they go into the hands of the rating clerk.
He takes those letters and places upon them stamps indicating the amount of postage due. That amount is charged either against the box department, if the letters are delivered through the carriers. Then elligent and full discussion this House would have approved the the carrier department if they are delivered through the carriers. Then those departments make their collections and make their returns, thus It is well for us to remember that there has been no change in the requiring this additional amount of detail account work.

But should the parties to whom the letters are addressed not be found the letters upon which these stamps are placed, indicating that the postage has not been fully paid, have to go through all the ramifications of a return and a final sending to the dead-letter office, and there has to be a complete adjustment of the postmaster's accounts in order that he may receive credit for the debit charges for these 2-cent order that he may receive credit for the debit charges for these 2-cent stamps, which is the rate over the half-ounce. It is one of the most complicated and troublesome accounts that postmasters have with the Post-Office Department, and it is believed by the Department that, in view of the amount of labor that is expended in all the branches of the office concerned, a change of weight from the half-ounce to the ounce would result in a dollar-and-cent benefit to the Government.

In the correspondence that the Department has had with half a dozen of the leading postmasters of the country-I mean the postmasters of the large cities—without a single exception every one has recommended this change as one that would meet the convenience of the people, and, they believe, at the same time bring revenue to the Department.

Mr. WEAVER. Does this bill make that change?

Mr. BINGHAM. This bill makes that change.

If we can consummate this proposed legislation we will have the cheapest letter-postage of any of the civilized nations of the world—

2 cents for one ounce of letter matter for any distance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the limited time that is allowed me I desire Now, Mr. Chairman, in the limited time that is allowed me I desire to call the attention of the House to this general bill, which is before it for consideration. While I appland the liberal spirit of the gentlemen who have incorporated in this bill wise legislation, I charge them at the same time with illiberality and an unfair and inadequate recognition of the wants of the people. It seems to me that the instruction that this House gave the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads at the first session of this Congress should have borne fruit in their deliberations session of this Congress should have borne fruit in their deliberations upon this bill. They came in here in the first session of this Congress with a bill reducing the appropriations from the amounts recommended by the Department between four and five million dollars.

What did this House do? On every item of reduction, without a single exception, this House accepted the recommendations of the Department and condemned the action of the committee in making the reductions. But it seems that has had no effect upon the committee, for it comes in to-day with the same items and with the same failure to recognize either the recommendations of the Post-Office Department or the judgment of this House.

Let me advert at this point to the one item of appropriation for the letter-carrier service. The Department asks $4,535,000. This bill proposes to appropriate $4,100,000, and yet in the exhibit of the gentleman [Mr. Townshend] he shows you that the service this year has expended under the appropriation $4,059,000. The constituency that I represent know the requirements and the necessity of the letter-carrier represent know the requirements and the necessity of the letter-carrier service. The great cities can not get along without it. The hundreds of thousands, the millions, of letters that pour into the offices of Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Chicago, and the other great centers must be got out of the offices as quickly as they get in.

The accumulation of mail matter is so rapid that it requires an output as rapid as the input, and that can be had only through the letter-carrier service. This bill appropriates $4,100,000 for that purpose the company year is $4,000,000 but we carrier service. This bill appropriates $4,100,000 for that purpose. Your rate of appropriation for the current year is $4,050,000; but we find by the deficiency bill that, under the law made by this Congress granting the carriers leave of absence, the Department is $50,000 in deficiency. The Department has not violated the law in a single particular, but it will receive from this House the $50,000 deficiency under the law. The carrier service, as appropriated for under this bill, is creatly the express the carrier service of this way. $4,100,000 exactly the same as the carrier service of this year, $4,100,000. Your carriers are paid under a general statute. The 4,000 carriers who are to-day doing that service get their promotion under a general statute. They go in at $600; after a year's service they receive $800; after another year's service they get $1,000. This bill, by $200,000, fails to meet the requirements of the law as it stands to-day on your statute-

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Townshend] speaks of the liberal spirit of his bill, yet he fails to appropriate up to the requirements of the law. What are you going to do in the large cities, with their 10 and 15 per cent. increase? You have got to meet it somehow. The recommendation of the Department simply asks that it shall be allowed the increase of facilities and of man force which is absolutely necessary to meet the increased demands of the mail service. Therefore I say to the House that the Committee on Appropriations have failed to be impressed by the judgment of the House, when, in the last session of this Congress, after full and intelligent discussion, the House voted the supplies that the Department had asked for.

reduction of $3,800,000, under the recommendations of the Department in this wise: He makes a reduction of $2,000,000 in railroad transportation, and he makes a reduction of $700,000 in postmasters' salaries. If the gentleman had a desire to bring in a bill that would seem to be small in the amount appropriated, why did they not cut down the items of railroad transportation and postmasters' salaries? It makes no difference whether this House appropriates one million or five million dollass for those two items.

If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] wanted to impress the country with the limited amount of appropriations contained in this bill he might have made his reduction on those two items. Of the $3,700,000 reduction he has made $2,700,000 in those items. They are paid under the general statute. The general statute regulates the pay of postmasters as it regulates the pay for railroad transportation. The railroads do the work and send their bills to the Department. The postmasters do not send to the Department all the money they receive for the sale of stamps.

Under the law he retains and keeps out his own salary, sending to the Department only the surplus. Therefore, if the gentleman desired to impress the House with economy in his bill he might have made the item for postmasters' salaries and railroad transportation less than the sums appearing upon the face of the bill without hurting any one.

appearing upon the face of the bill without nurring any one.

The Department came here last year asking for an appropriation of $50,000,000. The committee appropriated $49,000,000. Here in the deficiency bill already before the committee is an application, covering the several items of deficiency, for $1,100,000. For what they failed to appropriate last year for railroad transportation and for postmasters' salaries the Department comes in to-day with deficiencies, inviting the attention of Congress to the law governing the case; and your Committee on Appropriations will, of necessity, report the deficiencies faorably to the House because they come under the statute.

One other point. Clerk-hire for post-offices is another important item in the working of the Department. This bill on its face assumes to give $200,000 additional for clerk-hire for the next fiscal year as compared with the present fiscal year. The Department asks for $400,000 additional. What is the status of the clerical force of the postal service to-day? The Department has already communicated to Congress that there will be for this fiscal year a deficiency of $75,000 on clerk-hire. Therefore, if that deficiency is met by Congress, this bill will appropriate but $125,000 additional for the clerical force in the post-offices throughout the country. Eight thousand clerks in these post-offices are paid out of this appropriation.

There are 2,300 separating offices at which the compensation is paid out of this appropriation for clerk-hire. This bill virtually gives but $125,000 additional for this force. In other words, it will allow the appointment of about one hundred and fifty-six additional men for the entire service at a compensation of $800 per annum each. And in this large service at a compensation of $500 per annum each. And in this large service, embracing 8,000 subordinates, not a man can receive promotion, not a man can receive increased pay. Every man will be required to remain at his present stipend, without any reward for long or faithful or valuable service. or faithful or valuable service.

In the first session of this Congress, when the Postmaster-General came in asking for an increase of clerical force, I then said that his estimates were too low, that the service could not live upon his recommendation. The truthfulness of the statement I then made is borne out to-day, when the Department comes to this House asking a defi-ciency appropriation of $75,000 for this service.

This bill allows under the general law the appointment by the Post-Office Department of postmasters and the establishment of new offices wherever they are required. The general statute allows this; and this bill, together with the general law, provides the compensation for these Wherever over the country you want to locate new offices it can be done under the general statute, and the officers under that statute can receive their compensation.

Silver-Dollar Coinage.

SPEECH

HON. AYLETT H. BUCKNER.

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Saturday, February 28, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 8256) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes.

Mr. BUCKNER said:

Mr. Speaker: Seven years will have expired in a few days since the coinage of the silver dollar of 412½ grains at the rate of over $2,000,000 per month was authorized by law. The number of dollars coined under the month was authorized by law. month was authorized by law. The number of dollars coined under the act of February 28, 1878, was 191,947,194 on the 1st day of this month. The price of silver bullion purchased under the continuing appropriation of that act has been as follows: March 5, 1878, $1.2029; March 10, 1881, $1.1390; February 4, 1885, $1.0829; and the sum paid for silver bullion has aggregated the sum of $168,777,370.22 up to December 31, 1884; and the question which presses upon the attention of Congress is whether the time has not arrived when wise policy demands of us that we shall stop this laws are residuary of measurements. that we shall stop this large expenditure of money, or in some way modify the compulsory feature of the act under which this coinage is

It may be well to revert to the history of the passage of the act for the coinage of the silver dollar in order to discover the reasons of its enactment, and the circumstances and facts connected with its passage in the form we find it in our statutes. It is well known that the original the form we find it in our statutes. It is well known that the original bill authorized free and unlimited coinage, and was passed in this House during the Forty-fifth Congress on a suspension of the rules, without debate, on the motion of my esteemed colleague [Mr. Bland], by more than a two-thirds vote. It was referred to the Committee on Finance in the Senate, where the questions involved in the bill had been much discussed in the debate on the resolution introduced by Senator Matthews, of Ohio, in reference to the payment of the public debt. The Committee on Finance in the Senate reported an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the House bill, substantially in the form now on the statute-book, with the exception of the section providing for the issue of certificates based on deposits of silver dollars, which was added to the substitute in the Senate.

The purpose of the Senate amendment was to give the difference between the market value of silver and the legal value of the dollar to the Government, instead of to the mine and bullion owners, as would have been the effect of the House bill. This difference in value was at the time between 8 and 10 per cent., and the amount of bullion authorized to be purchased was not less than two million and not more than four million dollars' worth per month.

And in order to obtain the co-operation of other nations in establishing and maintaining a fixed relation in the value of gold and silver, and thus assure an appreciation in the value of the latter metal, the President was authorized to invite a conference among the European nations interested in the full remonetization of silver and making a fixed ratio between it and gold. If silver had not been depreciated below the value of gold by causes too well known to require any recapitulation, it can not be doubted but that the Senate would have passed the Bland bill as it came from the House, and we should have put silver on the same footing with gold, and we should have had free coinage for both metals at the ratio of 16 to 1 of gold. And but for this disparity (of the two metals) in their commercial or market value there would have been at that time no necessity or propriety in having a conference with other nations with the view of fixing an international ratio between the two metals.

It was this depreciation of silver, as compared with gold, the hope that our monthly purchase of from two to four millions of bullion would bring silver to a parity with gold, and the desire on the part of this Government that it should have the assistance of other nations in restoring silver to its time-honored position as international money, that led to the rejection of its free and unrestricted coinage by the Senate, and forced that body to adopt as a substitute the measure under which we have been since operating—restrictive in the amount of bullion purchased, compulsory in the sum to be coined, and abnormal, extraordinary, artificial, and only adapted to the then existing monetary conditions. This substitute for the House bill was afterward vetoed by the President, and became a law by a two-thirds vote of both Houses, there having been a very brief discussion in this House, where the bill originated.

That it was a prevailing opinion among the ablest and most steadfast friends of bimetallism in the Senate that the effect of the passage of the Senate bill would be to increase the market value of silver to that of gold is established by the debates in the Senate during its pendency there. Senator JONES, of Nevada (volume 28, page 1081, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-fifth Congress), is reported as saying:

My own opinion is that at the rate of 16 to 1, eighteen months will not have elapsed before silver will be back at its old place where it stood before demonetization took place, at 2 or 3 per cent, above gold, and that it will be the metal that will be excluded from the country.

Senator Thurman (page 1095) in the same debate said:

coinage under it should cease

Let me say to the Senate of the United States that this bill will bring back silver to its true value.

And in a colloquy with Senator Blaine as to the payment of United States bonds, on the same page, he is reported as follows:

In three years hence not your silver dollar of 425 grains, nor any other man's dollar of 435 grains, nor any other man's dollar of 435 grains, but the dollar of 412 grains will pay them at par with gold.

Senators Wallace, Ferry, and Windom (see Congressional Record, volume 28, page 1074) expressed similar opinions, and the former offered an amendment to the effect that if silver was worth less than .97 of a gold dollar after 100,000,000 had been coined under the present act the coinage under it should cease.

Mr. Speaker, I refer to the opinions of these distinguished advocates of the remonetization of silver to show that they hoped and believed that the effect of the act of February, 1878, would be to advance the market value of silver and bring it up to a parity with gold. When they refused to give the right of free and unlimited coinage to silver as gold bullion now has, and when they restricted the dollar coinage to a maximum and minimum sum, the profit or seigniorage to accrue to the Government, it is incredible that they expected to continue it if under its operations the then gap between silver and gold should not be closed. They could never have intended to invest hundreds of millions of dollars in the purchase of bullion after it was demonstrated that the divergence between the two metals was increased instead of being diminished, and after it was apparent that our standard dollar ed no international function, but was dwarfed to a mere silver token

Except that the effect of the act has been to remonetize the silver dollar and increase our domestic circulation the act of 1878 could not have been intended to be other than tentative, experimental, and tem-And is there any doubt that its failure to equalize the value of the two metals has been demonstrated after our experiment of near seven years' duration? Shall we give it another trial of seven years more in order to be convinced that this Government, unaided and alone, can not bring the white metal up to the value of the yellow in the markets of the world? If it was experimental and not designed to be the permanent policy of the Government, why shall it be continued when in spite of our legislation and in defiance of our predictions and our hopes we find that the divergence in the value of the money metals in 1878, instead of being lessened, has doubled in 1885.

Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat remarkable that at the late silver convention held at Denver the present restricted coinage of the siver dollar was not only not defended, but impliedly condemned. The silver miners are not satisfied to receive for the one-half of the silver output 14 to 16 per cent. more than the other half commands in the market, and they therefore demand that restricted coinage of silver shall ce and that the doors of the mints be opened to the free and unlimited and that the doors of the mints be opened to the free and unlimited coinage of the whole product of their mines. Such a proposition is absolutely preposterous and impracticable, after the experience of the last seven years, and in face of the fact that gold has been steadily advancing, or silver has been steadily declining, until the silver dollar is worth less than 85 cents as measured by gold, and that bimetallism has been losing ground among the nations of Europe from necessity and not from choice, since the passage of the act of 1878. If the purpose of the silver miners and bullion owners of the mountains is to make this country purpoly more probability and to discard gold as one of our money metals. purely monometallic, and to discard gold as one of our money metals, in disregard of the teachings and practice of the founders of our Government, no more effective policy to that end could be adopted.

Our people are thoroughly bimetallic, and will never be content with a monetary circulation composed exclusively either of gold or silver. Their traditions as well as their interests demand the use of both metals—with the values of each regulated at such a ratio as that neither shall be degraded to the condition of a mere money token, and both shall perform their part in the commercial exchanges of the world on terms of perfect equality. This can only be done by the concerted action of the chief nations of Europe with our Government; and to bring about this concert of action the first step must be taken by us, and that step should be to suspend the operations of the silvercoinage act for a time, in whole or in part, and at once enter upon negotiations with European nations to establish a fixed ratio of valuation between the two metals, and open their mints to the free coinage of both gold and silver on such terms as may be agreed upon. If we pursue our present policy there is nothing more certain than that the gap between the market value of the two metals will continue to grow, wider and wider, and this country will be compelled to make its choice between gold or silver monometallism. I would regard either as a great calamity to this country and the world, and I have an abiding conviction that the present is an opportune period for taking prompt and decisive action on this important question.

My reasons for this opinion must be stated very briefly and with but little elaboration. As I have said, the operations of the act of 1878 have failed to accomplish one of the chief results hoped and expected from it, and that was to bring silver to a parity of value with gold. friends of bimetallism in Great Britain and on the continent of Europe friends of bimetallism in Great Britain and on the continent of Europe regard it as an important step in the desired direction that the United States repeal or modify the provisions of this act. As evidence of this I make an extract from a letter from the secretary of the International Money Standard Association of Great Britain to a gentleman in the city of New York, in which he uses the following language:

It is in times of sharply falling prices as at present that the association can count upon a better hearing, and the object of the association is, by the distribution of their own literature and through the press, to enlighten public opinion on the subject; but the turning point in the movement is generally supposed here to be the suspension of legal-tender silver coin on your side.

Surely the online of men many of them of the greatest learning and

Surely the opinion of men, many of them of the greatest learning and practical experience in Europe, and not a few of them professed converts to bimetallism, who have witnessed the long-continued prostration of business and the fall of prices on the other side of the water which the statistics to the state of the st which they attribute to the demonetization of silver by Germany and other nations and the resultant appreciation of gold, should be heeded by the bimetallists of America. I am free to say that I believe that the cessation of our futile attempt to uphold the value of silver, with out the help of other silver-using nations, will in all likelihood tend to its further depreciation and fluctuation in value, and thus may add to the embarrassments of trade and commerce between the nations of the world.

This may give strength and influence to the bimetallic movement among the rulers of Europe, and create a public opinion in favor of supplementing the stock of gold with silver and of equalizing both metals as a necessity to the commerce and exchanges of the world. Desperate diseases, among peoples as among individuals, sometimes require desperate remedies; and as silver, by the mischievous action of governments, is the sick man of the monetary world, it may be that he will be sicker before he is better.

But if our policy of compulsory coinage has failed to produce the fruit anticipated from its adoption, its influence upon other nations has been positively deleterious to the cause of bimetallism on the Continent of Europe. Since 1878 Italy has resumed payment of her inconvertible paper, and has drawn upon the decreasing stock of gold to the amount of $80,000,000 for the purpose of resumption. Holland has put some millions of her depreciated silver on the market in order to replenish her stock of the yellow metal, and the little Kingdom of Greece is preparing to follow in the footsteps of Italy, while Austria-Hungary is reported to be making negotiations for $150,000,000 as a preparatory step to withdrawing her irredeemable circulation.

Thus state after state is engaging in the scramble for gold, not because the states prefer to resume on gold, but because resumption in depreciated silver would be no resumption, and because they are unwilling to become "the monetary India of Europe," the sink of all the deto become "the monetary India of Europe," the sink of all the de-based metal of the continent. Is it not apparent that all Europe will in a few years close their mints against silver, except for the purposes of subsidiary coinage, and learn to rely upon gold exclusively as a money metal, unless some decisive steps are taken by the bimetallic nations of the world to arrest this gold monometallic tendency? It is the United States alone of all the great nations of the world that is at-tempting to uphold silver, and our efforts in that direction have produced a contrary effect by their failure to arrest the downward tendency of silver, and by the increasing number of nations that have become and will become gold monometallies. Let us proclaim to the world in some form that we will no longer bear this burden alone, but that others must share it with us; and when this resolution is once taken, I, in common with all the friends of bimetallism in other countries, will be greatly mistaken if the great and small powers of Europe do not agree upon a fixed ratio between the metals and again open their mints to the free coinage of silver as well as gold.

But, Mr. Speaker, what does this scramble for gold among the nations of the world mean? What influence has it had, and is it destined to have, on the commerce and the business of the world, on the prices of commodities, and the wages of the toiling masses? Is there any connection between the demand by the nations of the world for gold for monetary purposes and the general shrinkage in values, the fall in the prices of commodities and the depression in business that prevails in Europe and America, and in fact throughout the civilized world? Has the growing disuse of silver as money, and the consequent increased drafts upon the diminishing stock of gold, by the United States and the states of Europe, had any influence upon the prices of labor or its production? These questions are receiving the best thought of statesmen and economists, and they involve the gravest considerations touching the progress and advancement of civilization and the interest of our common humanity.

It is universally conceded that the stock of gold for many years past has increased little, if any, beyond the annual wastage and its use in the arts and manufactures and other uses than money. Its production, according to the estimate of the Director of the Mint, has fallen off in the last three years from $103,000,000 in 1881 to $94,000,000 in 1883, and at least one-half the yearly production is used by four of the great nations of the world for other purposes than money. The London Bullionist, an accredited authority on monetary questions, estimates that in 1874 the gold money in circulation throughout the world was $3,460,000,000 for a population of 90,000,000 then using it; whereas in 1884 it had increased to $3,895,000,000 for a population of 223,000,-

In 1874, according to these estimates, the gold circulation was equal to $36 per capita, and in 1884 the gold circulation per capita was but $17 among gold-using peoples. In England it is conceded by many of her most eminent economists and statisticians that the purchasing power of gold has very largely increased owing to the absorption by Germany first, and then by the United States, of from seven to nine hundred millions of the world's supply of gold; and that the fall in the prices of commodities consequent upon this increased purchasing power has averaged from 25 to 60 per cent. on the leading and important articles of commerce. In fact, it is admitted by all that gold has grown and is growing scarcer, prices have declined and are now declining, and trade has suffered and is now suffering, not only in all parts of the European continent, but throughout the world, America

This unusual condition of things can not be attributed to any mere local cause, because the effect is general and not confined to any state or people. It exists as well in free-trade countries as in those that are more or less protective. It affects the productions of manual labor as well as the products of the factory and of machinery; and it includes the entire output of the farm as well as that of the mine and the shop. The cause of such universal depression in the prices of commodities must be as general and widespread as the effect. The fall in prices has been coeval with the demand made by Germany first, followed by the United States and other countries, on the world's diminished and diminishing supply of gold, and must continue with any additional strain upon this supply.

Gold is in fact the sole measure of the value of all commodities here and elsewhere throughout the civilized world. London is the clearing-house of all nations, and there gold is the yard-stick by which the values of all products are measured. For local exchanges paper substitutes and silver may and do affect domestic prices to a large extent; but the immense mass of silver francs in France and the two hundred and fifty millions of dollars, half-dollars, and quarter-dollars in the United States play no part either in the international exchanges of the world or in determining the prices of commodities in the great marts of trade abroad! Every additional state in Europe or elsewhere that goes upon the market to purchase gold for resumption or for the use of its people for circulation increases the purchasing power of this metal, and appreciates its value as compared with other commodities, including the silver of Colorado, the cotton of the South, the iron of Pennsylvania, and the wheat and provisions of the Northwest, and thus adds to the burdens of the tax-payer and the debtor.

It has been said by high French authority that France would have been hopelessly bankrupt in 1848 but for the great influx of gold from California and Australia, which created a degree of commercial prosperity which enabled the French people to surmount the difficulties in which they were entangled. In this country, as we all know, the product of gold from the mines gave an impetus to the prosperity of all classes that has never been surpassed before or since. If there is any truth in the theory that the amount of circulation stands in a certain relation to the question of price, and that a full and increasing circulation has the effect to advance prices, it must follow that a scant and decreasing circulation will create a fall in prices—such as we are witnessing at this time throughout the commercial world—and that shrinkage in values, being common to all nations and peoples and to every product of human labor, can be attributed to no cause that is not alike common to all nations and all commodities.

Are we then entering a long night of falling prices, depressed labor, and unprofitable business? Impressed as I am with the conviction that the business of the world can not be carried on without the use of both silver and gold, and sharing in the opinion of one of the most eminent statisticians and economists of Great Britain, expressed in the Paris conference of 1878, that the effort of more of the nations of the world to adopt the gold standard would produce a "tremendous crisis," and believing so long as we maintain our position of attempting and failing to uphold the value of silver that gold monometalism will from necessity be adopted by other important states, it seems to me that there can be no permanent and lasting improvements in prices of the leading articles of American production unless we remove what I conceive to be the chief obstacle to full remonetization of silver and the mints of Europe are opened to the coinage of silver. There will of necessity be an improvement in many branches of production, but prices will remain low and comparatively unremunerative.

The continued appreciation of the only standard of value, all other things being equal, will depress more or less the prices of all commodities, and especially the productions of my section and of the South We must make one monetary mass of the gold and silver of the world if we would secure advancing or even stationary prices and give re-munerative employment to labor. The two metals must be harnessed together at an agreed ratio of valuation, and they must each perform all the functions of domestic as well as international money. The mints of the important commercial nations must be opened to the free if not unlimited coinage of both gold and silver, so that each may exchange its silver for gold and gold for silver on the same terms as to Both metals must be made to perform all the functions of money, in foreign as well as in domestic exchanges. Powerful, wealthy, and abounding in resources as we are we can no more accomplish these desired results unaided, and without the assistance of other nations, than I can transmit a letter to London or Paris at the same rate of postage as I can send it to Saint Louis, without the concurrence and agreement of Great Britain and France. The millions of coined silver in France and in the United States are, in the expressive language of the dis-tinguished French bimetallist, M. Chernuski, but silver greenbacks. Their circulation is confined to prescribed limits, and perform but a part of the office of a circulating medium, while it should perform, with gold, the office of an international circulation. What the world needs is rated, not unrated, bimetallism, and this seems impossible under our

Mr. Speaker, I have not attempted to elaborate any of the propositions I have advanced. My purpose has been to present as concisely as possible some of the reasons which have brought me to the conclusion that the time has arrived when we should make known to the commercial nations of the world, alike interested with this Government in the full rehabilitation of silver and its restoration to its former place as one of its money metals, that we will no longer continue the efforts in which we have so signally failed. Nor have I thought it would add to our ability to solve the grave and momentous problem before us to criticise either by way of condemnation or approval the errors, mistakes, or delinquencies of the executive officers of the Government in the execution of the dollar-coinage act. However much they may have failed to put into execution the intention of Congress as expressed in its legislation, and whatever may have been the hostility of Secretary Sherman or his successors to that legislation, it can have no

Secretary Sherman or his successors to that legislation, it can have no legitimate influence on our opinions as to the present status of silver here and elsewhere to-day, and in helping us to a proper judgment as to our best policy in the future.

The acts of past administrations belong to history. It is the present and the future that concern us. It is of no avail to be told that silver has had no friends in the Treasury Department, and that the execution of the laws of Congress in its interest has been helf-hearted and nonof the laws of Congress in its interest has been half-hearted and perfunctory, in response to the fact that silver has been declining in value every year since the passage of the act, after the extraordinary expenditure of $3 per capita of the whole population to bring about a parity of value between the two metals, or that prices of all commodities have declined and are declining in spite of our large gold, silver, and paper circulation. But if the past is to be resurrected to prejudice our judgments and disturb our reason, we should not forget to screen our own record—the record of the legislative department—as to the

Let us at least "take the mote out of our own eye before we cast out the beam out of our brother's." When we determined to substitute silver subsidiary coinage for fractional currency Congress ordered the latter to be destroyed as it was redeemed. Instead of requiring the destruction of the small-note circulation, filling the channels of circulation which the silver dollar should have supplied, we have to the day taken no step to prevent the circulation of even the one and two dollar bills, except those of the banks, and this was done under the provisions of the original national banking acts when both metals had provisions of the original national banking acts when both metals had been driven out of the country. Even in the last Congress the sum of $150,000 or $160,000 was appropriated to pay for the printing of new issues of one and two dollars, notwithstanding the boards of trade and the chambers of commerce in every city in the United States petitioned this House to provide for their early destruction in anticipation of the danger which these bodies now deem imminent. I doubt whether any people can parallel our extraordinary stupidity and extravagance in the treatment of the silver dollar.

We first invest millions to buy bullion to secure a plentiful circulation of silver dollars for the people. We are at all the expense of providing mints, and pay all the cost of coinage. Not satisfied with this, we appropriate year by year between one and two hundred thousand dollars to issue one and two dollar notes in sufficient quantities to drive the silver dollar into Government vaults, and being deposited there, the silver dollar into Government vaults, and being deposited there, silver certificates are issued with many of the functions of money, which become congested in the money centers and are exciting alarm among business men by their tending to drive both gold and greenbacks out of circulation. To complete this picture of folly and extravagance, we are called upon every now and then to expend large sums to make provision for the custody of our immense mass of coined silver, when, by proper legislation, three-fourths of the whole amount of the coined dollars would now be in the hands and pockets of the people and in bank vaults. Human ingenuity could not have devised legislation more unvaults. Human ingenuity could not have devised legislation more un-wise and extravagant, or better calculated to defeat one of the prime objects of coinage—that of providing a coin circulation for the people. I have not called attention to this question on account of any appre-hension of imminent financial disaster growing out of the withdrawal of our gold coinage consequent upon the accumulation of silver certifi-cates in the channels of business and in the coffers of the Treasury. This dread of the future in the money centers in the present depression of trade and business will of itself tend to precipitate a financial panic; but with our present favorable trade balances, with large crops on hand, and the liquidation of indebtedness that has already taken place, there would seem to be no good reason for present alarm. That a much longer continuance of the policy of fabricating depreciated coinage and storing it in Government vaults, on which certificates having the function of discharging all indebtedness to the Government are issued, will in time bring the business of the country to an exclusive basis of un-in time bring the business of the country to an exclusive basis of unrated and depreciated silver would seem not to admit of question.

If that is desirable, we should certainly adhere to the present policy of buying bullion, for the longer it continues the cheaper we shall buy bullion, and the more dollars we shall store and the more vaults we shall build. I do not place my objection to a continuance of the purchase and coinage of silver to any fear of imminent financial disaster. I object to it because it is a demonstrated failure. I object to it because them are ablest to the propoles. cause it involves a worse than useless expenditure of the people's money; I object to it because it creates a necessity for bimetallic nations in Europe to become gold monometallic; I object to it because it endangers the position of silver as the equal of gold as a money metal; I object to it because it is an obstacle to real bimetallism, and will intensify the demand for gold and prolong indefinitely the present shrinkage of values, the general depression of business and the disorganization of labor, and last, but not least, I object to it because it fetters and embarrasses the incoming administration, and transfers to it the heritage of probable financial disturbance in the not distant future. Aid to Common Schools.

SPEECH

HON. HARDEMAN. THOMAS OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 26, 1885,

On the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of com-mon schools.

Mr. HARDEMAN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I propose at the proper time to amend the bill under consideration, giving the power to the executive of a State, if deemed advisable by him, to appropriate ——, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the establishment of a school or schools of technology be necessary, for the establishment of a school or schools of technology in said State; and the further sum of $10,000 annually to maintain the same. If this bill is to become a law, and this vast amount of money is to be appropriated, as is alleged, for the education of the people, I insist that some portion of it be so applied as to confer practical benefits and results upon those upon whom it is expended. Friendly as I am, and have ever been, to the common schools of my State and the country, I am satisfied that if half of the money expended for their support had been applied to building up a system of technical training more good would have resulted to the State and country industrially, educationally, and morally. cationally, and morally.

I do not underestimate the advantages of universal education as an enlightening agency among the people, yet I can not indorse all that has been claimed for it upon this floor as a preventive of crime and immorality, for the statistics of the country do not verify the prophecies of educational enthusiasts that as you educate the people you would, to that extent, lessen vice and crime. In sorrow, yet truthfully, has it been said that

In spite of the vast amount expended in education; in spite of the improvements which have been going on for fifty years in philosophy and in methods of education; in spite of the vast multiplication of schools and colleges and the diffusion of free tuition, which has everywhere reduced the number of the illiterate; in spite of all this, the degeneration of society in happiness, in virtue, in health, in mental and physical capacities has been going on singularly parallel with the improved systems of education.—Buchanan's Moral Education.

The history of crime, says Samuel Royce (a learned investigator), in his work, Deterioration and Race Education, is but the history of our education. Professor John Draper, Herbert Spencer, Ruskin, Huxley, and other great thinkers have asserted that the common system of education as now practiced is not a conservative moral power in the prevention of crime, and the statistics of crime and immoral reference is the provention of crime and the statistics of crime and immoral reference in the prevention of crime, and the statistics of crime and immoral reference in the prevention of crime, and the statistics of crime and immoral reference in the prevention of crime, and the statistics of crime and immoral reference in the prevention of crime, and the statistics of crime and immoral reference in the prevention of crime, and the statistics of crime and immoral reference in the prevention of crime, and the statistics of crime and immoral reference in the prevention of crime, and the statistics of crime and immoral reference in the prevention of crime, and the statistics of crime and immoral reference in the prevention of crime, and the statistics of crime and immoral reference in the prevention of crime and crime in the prevention of crime in the preventio vention of crime, and the statistics of crime and immoranties, as inrhished in reports of bureaus, prison-houses, and houses of reformation, confirm these assertions. Gladly would we disguise the fact if we could; but truth forces the confession that in this age of progress and educational advancement there has been a fearful increase in crime, in pauperism, intemperance, insanity, suicides, and disruption of mariin pauperism, intemperance, insanity, suicides, and disruption of martal relations. This increase has been charged against illiteracy; but the charge is not sustained by the tables of statisticians. Of 2,923 convicted and sentenced to the penitentiaries in New York in 1882, 2,499 could read and write, 2,127 drank; and of 17,341 arrests made by the police of New York in the months of October, November, and December, 1882, according to police reports, twenty-seven thirtieths could read and write. Richard Vaux, president of board of inspectors of the State penitentiary of the eastern division of Pennsylvania, in his State reports says: State reports, says:

Four times as many convicts during a period of twenty-six years were received in the east penitentiary of Pennsylvania who were educated to the extent of reading and writing as were wholly illiterate, and a far larger number of convicts have attended school than who never went to school.

I give his statistics showing the number received and the number and percentage of illiterates:

Years.	Received.	Illiterate.	Per cent.	Read and write.	Per cent.
1850 to 1859*	1,605	243	15, 14	1,115	60.47
1860 to 1869	2,383	410	17, 21	1,617	70.37

Verifying his statement that "more persons convicted of crime are educated than those who are illiterate." Only 11 per cent. of the convicts in 1876 in the State of Massachusetts, says the report of the State commissioner, were illiterate, and it is charged in that same report "that there is hardly a State or country in the civilized world where atrocious and flagrant crimes are so common as in educated Massachusetts." (Samuel Royce, volume I, page 462.)

The Philadelphia Times, in an article a few years since reviewing the condition of society and the frequency of crime among its people, says: What a terrible satire upon our boasted free-school system! Nine-tenths of the young criminals sent to the penitentiary have enjoyed its advantages, but three-fourths of them never learned to do an honest stroke of work.

In the province of Ontario, from 1874 to 1880, of 3,859 persons committed to provincial prisons, only 14 per cent. were illiterate; 2,792 habitaal drinkers. Of 264 persons committed in Connecticut in 1882, 253 could read and write; 11 could not; 55 were temperate; 209 intemperate. The statistics of Massachusetts are cited particularly, not to disparage that grand old Commonwealth, but because it is universally conceded that in education, refinement, ay 'in every thing that elevates a people and dignifies a State, she has generally led. For this reason I now refer to statistics furnished by herself as strongest proof that education and refinement have not lessened crime or pauperism. I quote from one of her State reports. In 1876 "only 11 per cent. of her convicts were illiterate; in 1880, 25 per cent.; in 1881, 23 per cent. Of 213 convicts in 1882, 172 could read and write, 41 were illiterate." "One in every 364 natives is poor, and 1 in every 546 a convict." "The amount of crime is above the general average of the United States, and the number of insane, idiotic, deaf and dumb, was 16,513. The objects of State charity had increased from 29,066 in 1872 to 82,997 in 1877. In 1876, 148,936 tramps were counted in her limits. In 1875, 20,000 were detained in her common prisons, 852 in that of the State; 1 in 22 of her general population were poor, 1 in 380 criminals."

This is indeed a sad showing for a State of her great enlightenment, but the history of Massachusetts, plainly told by her own statisticians, but the history of Massachusetts, plainly told by her own statisticians, is but the history of other States almost her equal in educational advantages and refining influences. "In Maine population had increased from 1850 to 1880 one-seventh. Crimes, such as murder, arson, rape, robbery, and piracy, had tripled. Divorce, insanity, and suicides had all largely increased despite of temperance laws and New England education." (Buchanan's Moral Education, page 335.)

From 1820 to 1840, a period of twenty years, says Judge Stoddard, only two convictions for murder or arson are known to have occurred; in 1880 there were thirty-three prisoners for homicidal crimes alone.

in 1880 there were thirty-three prisoners for homicidal crimes alone. In the United States crime has outstripped population. In 1850 the population was 19,553,668; convicts, 5,645; 1 to every 3,463 inhabitants. In 1860 the population was 26,922,537; convicts, 19,086. In 1870 the population was 33,589,377; convicts, 32,901; 1 to every 1,021 inhabitants. (Boyce's Deterioration and Race Education, volume 1,

The same may be said of other countries. According to Potter, crime has increased since the beginning of this century to 1850 in England and Wales to five times; in Ireland from 1805 to 1849 to twelve times; in Scotland from 1815 to 1849 to seven times. While the population increased 79 per cent., crime has risen 482 per cent. In Holland, according to Guringer, crime has increased 72 per cent., and the prisoners 34 per cent. These are not isolated examples of countries, or States of our own, for the statistics of other nations, and other States in our Government, give similar results and establish the fact that the educational system of this age "has but little restraining influence upon crime." Those same statistics prove also that it is not proof against pauperism, insanity, suicide, or intemperance.

It is asserted in these authorities that in Germany, France, and Eng. It is asserted in these authorities that in Germany, France, and England 3, 4, and 5 percent. of the population are paupers, or that 30,000, 40,000, 50,000 respectively of each million of their population are paupers. In 1847 every eighth man in London and every tenth man in England was a pauper. In 1852 every seventh man in Marseilles and every thirteenth man in Paris was a pauper. In 1855 every twelfth man in Italy, every sixth man in Belgium, and twice as many in Flanders were paupers. In 1869 Paris had 317,742 persons out of a population of 1,799,880 dependent upon public charity. Prussia gave relief to 4.89 per cent. of its entire population. Sweden, with a population of 4,000,000, had a pauper population of 148,000. Norway, with a population of 1,700,000, had 180,000. Denmark, with about the same population, had 74,324 paupers.

In Belgium in 1856, 226,000 families lived upon alms; 220,000 in utter misery; 273,000 in poverty; only 89,630 in comfort; or, to particularize, of its 908,000 families 446,000 are public paupers. Of every one hundred Belgians forty-nine lived in utter destitution, forty-two in poverty, only nine comfortably. In England the counties lying be-tween London and the southern coast are by far less illiterate than the north-middle counties and have yet a great deal more pauperism. In north-middle counties and have yet a great deal more pauperism. In the great State of New York, in our own country, the progress of pauperism is alarming and increasing yearly, rising from 58,219 in 1871 to 69,813 in 1884. In addition to this last number 122,391 were supplied by charities outside city and county poor-houses. The following table of statistics of the board of State charities in Massachusetts shows the increasing pauperism of that State: In 1872, wholly and partially supported, 29,066; 1874, 41,130; 1876, 73,739; 1877, 82,997. in 1826 to 36,039,364 in 1850, or in ratio of 100 to 113, suicides had risen in the ratio of 100 to 209. In Denmark from 1835 to 1856 the proportion of suicides had risen from 219 to 392 in every million of population." In Prussia suicides had increased from 510 in 1823 to 2,180 in 1858. In most European countries suicides have increased from 3 to 5 per cent., while population has been 1.64 per cent—a sickening feature; and I call particular attention to the statement below:

In the suicides in a million population in France there were—farmers, 90; industrials, 128; liberal professions, 218; the poor, 569. (Royce, Det. and Race, volume 1, page 233.)

In the rural districts at a late period there were 110 suicides in a million population; in educated Paris 640; in Copenhagen 477; while in the least educated nations of Europe, the Spanish and Sclavonian, there was less than half the average rate of France, Germany, and England.

So the tables show the terrible fact of a yearly increase in insanity, In England and Wales there were: Idiots and insane in 1859, 36,762; in 1869, 53,177; in 1876, 64,916. In France in 1850, 20,061; in 1860, 28,761; in 1869, 38,545 in the asylums. These do not include the very large number in private institutions and homes.

In the Rhenish Provinces of Prussia the ratio of insane to population was, in 1828, 1 insane to 1,027 population; in 1856, 1 insane to 666 pop-

In Wurtemberg, insanity had increased since 1832 76.3 per cent.; population, only 13.5 per cent.

Massachusetts, according to Dr. Irwin's health report, had an annual increase in 1867 equal to 1 for every 1,546; in 1871, 1 for every 1,389; in 1872, 1 for every 1,357 population.

In the United States, the increase in fifty-four asylums were: In 1839,

1,329 insane, 961 annual new cases; in 1849, 7,029 insane, 2,961 annual new cases; in 1859, 13,696 insane, 5,342 annual new cases; in 1869, 22,549 insane, 8,769 annual new case

Says this same author, volume 1, page 28:

The increase of insanity for a century has been steady, large, and universal in the ratio of the spread of our civilization. The universally educated Scandinavians have 3.4 insane in 1,000 population. The cultivated German, 3 in 1,000. The less educated Romanic nation, 1 in 1,000; and the most barbarous Selavonic races, 0.6 in 1,000. Again, the ratio of insane to population is larger in cities than in the country, and the professionally educated, who compose 5.04 per cent. of the population, yield 13.8 of the insane.

The statistics might be further extended to show the increase of intemperance, divorce, and illegitimacy in our most thoroughly educated States; yet why continue the sickening recital, for the world knows notwithstanding this increase in crime and pauperism, suicide and insanity, that at no time in her history has so much money been expended in the education of the masses as is being annually spent in this age. The United States, with her $200,000,000 of school property, and $100,000,000 annually for teachers; England, France, Belgium, Germany, and other states, with millions of schoolars and millions of money for their schools are described as a school of school are school. for their education, should verify the prediction that there would be a diminution of crime and pauperism and vagrancy and suicide and immorality. Yet says a learned investigator:

Alas, alas! nearly all statistical records seem to agree in the alarming fact that during all this development of education the misery and degradation of human beings has not been alleviated, but terribly aggravated.

Surely too much has been claimed by the friends of education in its preventing crime; for if the history of crime verifies the fact, despite of educational prognostics, that society has been degenerating in those great elements that make communities moral and governments sound and pure, there must be some mistake in the claim of its friends, or some fatal error in the educational systems as practiced. I am constrained to believe the fault lies largely in the system.

Read the works of the authors treating on crime and you will discover that their investigations lead them to the conclusion that work is the surest preventive. Does the education of this age fit a man for the "labor of life?" It is not broad and comprehensive enough for that. "labor of life?" It is not broad and comprehensive enough for that. No one at all acquainted with our present systems (and they are so because of usuage and erroneous teachings) will deny that the tendency of our educated civilization is to degrade labor, thereby creating caste distinctions in society, thus lowering the social relations of those engaged in it—a result which is prejudicial to sound morals and good government. We need a system of education not designed for the benefit of the few, but for the elevation of the masses—a system where "the school and the scholar (do not) avoid the contact with the workshop and the mechanic." The need of the nation to-day is workers, and that system of education is best which fits the children of the nation for industrial pursuits, which not only furnish subsistence and a comfortable living, but elevate and dignify the character of those engaged in them.

ends in view. The labor of the country is the capital of the country; if, therefore, education enhances the value of labor, then the more educated and skillful the labor the greater will be its productive power, and, proportionately, the increase of capital. These facts being established, the conclusion is irresistible, that the education of labor is essential to a people's growth and prosperity, and that in establishing a system of public education that one should be adopted which would best develop not only the productive elements of wealth, but of manly character and useful citizenship. A different kind of training from that of the present is required to prevent crime. More industrial education is demanded for the young, who by honest labor must make their way through life; for, as has been said by a board of prison management, "its benefit as a preventive of crime is being satisfactorily proven and in rescuing prisoners can not be too much emphasized."

One of the authors heretofore cited asserts that the learned Lieber in his Ethics of Politics "affirms that all his investigations lead him to the conclusion that modern crime is very much due to the want of fixed occupations;" not to illiteracy, but to idle training and habit, which "starve the masses, breed mutiny, and end in national suicide." This assertion is based upon facts disclosed in prison histories. Among 358 prisoners in one prison, he found only 1 in 7 who had a trade. Of 240 convicts in another prison only 12 had a trade. Of the criminals of 17 prisons in the United States in 1868, 79 per cent. were without trades. In these prisons, says one statistician, "there is seldom found a good carpenter, shoemaker, or blacksmith, and still less a good machinist or

In the elaborate table (already alluded to) of Richard Vaux of the convicts in the Eastern State penitentiary of Pennsylvania, for twenty-five years, I find, of prisoners confined from 1850 to 1859, 1,608, of which 1,217, or 75.52 per cent., had no trade; from 1860 to 1869, 2,383, of which 1,950, or 78.83 per cent., had no trade; from 1870 to 1876, 1,650, of which 1,463, or 88.66 per cent., had no trade. He has many pages of statistics, all showing, says the author from whom I copy, "how much the want of a trade and how little what we term education has to do with the perpetration of crime."

Every one who studies closely these statistics will be forced to the conclusion that educated idleness is more destructive to public morals and more prolific of crime than trained and occupied illiteracy. want an education that will diminish idleness, and in so doing decrease pauperism and drunkenness and crime. We want, as has been well pauperism and drunkenness and crime. We want, as has been well said, "more of the gospel of work" preached to our children, which shall lift them out of struggling poverty into a state of competency. Then crime will diminish and our prisons will remain comparatively empty. Teach the young to work; prepare them for it by proper education and they will more cheerfully pursue it, and thus you will have industrious young men earning an honest living and turning their backs upon crime and prison-houses

This is no idle conjecture. In those places where industrial training has been taught for a series of years crime has diminished and pauper ism has almost disappeared.

In Belgium, says one writer, "in districts in which industrial schools are in operation, vagrancy, that hot-bed of crime, has entirely disappeared, notwithstanding the large numbers of paupers she had in 1856 alluded to previously in this address. At Creuzot, a city of 25,000 population, in which industrial instruction has been in vogue since 1847, crime and even misdemeanors have almost entirely disappeared, and three policemen give the people full protection." This is asserted by all writers on the subject of crime: "that wherever industrial education has been established it has rapidly diminished it; and this can not be said of any other education." It is easy to assert that education diminishes crime—I mean a common education—but those who have examined and studied criminal statistics do not so testify.

Richard Grant White, a learned educator, in speaking of the public schools of New York, says:

That they exert any wholesome influence upon our society, either morally or intellectually; that they make their pupils better men and women, or better citizens, or that they fit them for the duties or the business of their lives, I do not hesitate to deny.

Again he says:

Nor do the records of crime justify the general assumption that public schools are a conservative moral force in society. * * * It would be interesting to know what proportion of our native criminals have been pupils of our public schools. * * * Judging by my observation, I would say that the proportion is very large, so large that if it was authentically ascertained the publication of it would produce a profound and painful sensation.

An instance of their number has been cited in the prison records of Professor John W. Draper, in a work upon physiology, asserts that-Our common education has a tendency rather the reverse of restraining

The commissioners of the State prison of Connecticut, in their report in 1875, say-

Millions are annually expended in this State to secure to our youth the advantages of a good, common-school education, with the general impression that such instruction is a sure preventive of crime. Without intending the slightest reflection against this happy conclusion, we find our penitentiaries are filling up with many well-educated young men, who, on investigation, have ever been indentured to any regular trade or business, and without occupation are easily led into temptation and vice. * * * On a careful inquiry of our young prisoners we find it is not the want of a common-school education so much as the need of a good trade, with its habits of thrift, economy, and constant employment, that crowd our streets with paupers and our State prisons with convicts.

The importance of trade and occupation so thoroughly impressed the great founder of Pennsylvania, that among the ordinances framed by himself and adopted by his provincial council is the following:

Tenth. That while in England the children of the rich were too generally brought up in pride and sloth, good for nothing to themselves or others, in Pennsylvania all children of the age of 12 were to be brought up to some useful trade that there might be none of the worthless sort in the province, so that the poor might get plenty of honest bread by their work, and the rich, if brought low, might not be tempted to despair and steal.

This, sir, sounds the key-note to useful education and permanent prosperity. Professor Seelye says:

Men must be improved in order to be educated. Education follows as surely a moral improvement as flowers open to the sunlight; but education is as powerless to secure that improvement as is the plant the light and warmth by which it is quickened. No amount of intelligence ever saved any people, and the most costly educational system is consistent with and sometimes actually found in the most corrupt social state.

Greece, when her heavens shone with the light of learning and philosophy, when learned historians wrote and poets sang, was filled with de-praved masses; her temples reeked with the blood of her murdered citizens; revolution after revolution convulsed the state until her liberties were destroyed and she fell a prey to contending factions. Rome, in the very zenith of her intellectual splendor, tyrannized over justice and religion and filled the pages of her history with crimes at which civilization yet pales. France was in a blaze of intellectual light and the fires of genius were burning with brightest luster when infidelity and corruption destroyed the church, overthrew her liberties, and deluged her land with the blood of anarchy and revolution. So passed away Egypt, the cradle of letters, and Assyria, and Carthage, and the land of the Saracens.

Away then with the idea that the education of the people will give stability to government, close our prison doors, and open the millennial gates! Such is not the lesson of history:

The practical teachings

Says a learned writer-of the early and happy days of Greece and Rome built up the state. The later grammarians and sophists ruined it.

Illiteracy per se is not the cause of crime; it is to be deplored, I grant you, but do not burden it with evils that lie not at its door. There will never be ignorance enough in this country to threaten its perpetuity, and if ever destroyed, which God forbid, it will be by those the world calls educated and learned. Pauperism and its offspring, intemperance and insubordination to authority, may be the rocks upon which this Government may be wrecked, and the study of the patriot should be how to prevent it. The preventive is found in that Heaven-ordained this Government may be wrecked, and the study of the patriot should be how to prevent it. The preventive is found in that Heaven-ordained decree, "in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground." To escape these evils we must elevate and educate the working people and popularize labor by educational preparation for the great work of life, and this can be best accomplished by a well-devised system of industrial training.

I repeat here what I once said to the agriculturists of my own State:

I repeat here what I once said to the agriculturists of my own State:

Begin the system. Educate your boys to work, work systematically, work intelligently, work scientifically, and labor will be no longer "subjected to social degradation," for it will be guided by education and identified with culture. In the language of one of England's royal family, "Let learning and earning go together." Make hand-work a part of the education of your children and they will grow up conscious of their ability to carve out their own fortunes and command while so doing the respect of their fellows and the confidence and support of society and government.

Dr. E. E. White, president of Perdue University, Indiana, in an address on "The relation of education to industry," says that of the three hundred and eighty-three occupations enumerated in the report of the census of 1870, one hundred and seventy-two of them are classed as manufactures, mechanical, and mining industries. In view of this large number of trades and mechanical industries, well may I exclaim, hat the trades are many, the learned professions are few; and while much has been done for the few, but little has been done by the people to dignify, develop, and perfect the productive industries of the many, forgetful as they are of the great truth that the practical business education of the people is the shortest road to material prosperity and national wealth. Not only is industrial education an effective moral greater that it is eminently conducive to the greath and development. agency but it is eminently conducive to the growth and development of a country. I quote again from my address:

of a country. I quote again from my address:

History chronicles the fact that in those countries where industrial schools have multiplied the people have been elevated and their wealth increased. Society has been elevated, because the teaching of technics has multiplied handicrafts, encouraged labor, and given profitable employment to thousands who otherwise would have grown up in ignorance, pauperism, and crime. Wealth has been augmented because by the multiplication of industries and in the increased efficiency of labor engaged in them, the sources of production are increased and the difficulties of its attainment greatly diminished. These statements are justified by the teachings of all political economists, who assert that "the creation of all values can be traced to labor alone," and that the productiveness of labor depends upon its skill and intelligence.

One of our commissioners to the Paris exposition furnishes us a striking proof of the great value of technical training demonstrated by the results of the exposition of 1851 and 1867. In the former, Great Britain was awarded the palm of excellence in nearly all of the grand departments. In the mean time her continental rivals—France, Belgium and Austria—had diffused scientific and technical education (by a system of training school among their people) and when another exposition was held in 1867, under the auspices of Napoleon III, and the awards were made, it was discovered Great Britain had excelled in but ten of the ninety departments. This was startling news to England. "The scepter was departing from Judah." A Parliament commission was appointed to investigate the causes of this overwhelming defeat, and these are some of the reports to the inquiry commission of July 2,1867. Dr. Playfair says: "A singular accordance of opinion prevailed that our country had shown little inventiveness and made little progress in the peaceful arts of industry since 1862." I may add, during that interval these other countries, by means of training-schools in the trades, in weaving and mechanical schools, were making rapid advancement in Industrial and skillful pursuits."

But to continue the reports, Professor Tyndall says: "I have long entertained the opinion that, in virtue of the better education provided by the continental nations, England must one day, and that no distant one, find herself outstripped by those nations, both in the arts of peace and war." Mr. Hurth say: I found that it was the want of industrial education in this country which prevents our manufacturers from making that progress which other nations are making. I found both masters and foremen in other countries more scientifically educated than our own. The workmen of other countries have a far superior education to our own, many of whom have none whatever. Their production shows clearly that it is not there a machine-working machine, but that brains sit at the loom and intelligence stands at the spining-wheel."* This report to Parliament awakened England to a sense of her waning supremacy. The result was, says another authority, a grand educational bill was conceived and adopted, which established a general system of elementary and technical education (which is being taught in nearly one hundred schools of art), and upon which Great Britain is relying to regain her former prestige and pre-eminence. Nor are

Other countries now realize the importance of this training and are establishing industrial schools in every town and village. Prussia has about two hundred, Bavaria one hundred and fifty, Wurtemberg over about two inducted, havaria one hundred and fifty, whiteinbeig over fifty. Over eighty cities in France have them in operation, with over 30,000 pupils, and in her towns about three hundred smaller technical schools. England has eight hundred trade schools now in successful operation, with about 35,000 pupils. Germany swarms now with industrial schools. The United States had in 1876 seventy-five, giving instruction to 7,500 scholars. Every state should have a sufficient number to satisfy the increasing demand for technical training. Make your whole land a beehive.

Open to the young men of the country inviting fields of employment in its trades and industries, and they will not flock to the cities to crowd their dens of vice, nor resort to the overstocked professions or unremunerative occupations in counting-rooms and trade houses. So elevate your industries by proper education as to impress society with the theory "that industrial occupations are a proper basis of social distinction." Reorganize your educational system upon the basis of labor, giving every man according to his talent his own proper work, and "intelligence will be added to strength; beauty and harmony in the works of man will be followed by beauty and harmony in the character of man; and justice and goodness and truth will spread, and the country will be filled with peace and happiness."

This much I have thought my duty to say on the bill now under consideration, and I have said it not to disparage education or undervalue its benefits-far from it, for I most sincerely wish every child in this Union could read and understand our Constitution and the Holy Scriptures-but because I am thoroughly impressed with the conviction that our educational system should be reorganized on a basis of technical training, for "educated industry is indispensable to the perfection of moral character," and is the key-note in the song of social, material, and national prosperity. Educated hands and educated minds must move and direct the industries of the country. Mechanical philosophy is destined to relieve labor of its burden and toil of its care by subordinating natural agencies, animate and inanimate elements, to the necessities of man and the activities of life. These will be effected by a well-devised system of technical training.

To the laboratory and the workshop must we look for progress, development, society elevation, and national wealth.

Industrial training is the key given to man to open the gates to these great results. Upon it a people's character can be built, and the character of a people indexes their government. In the formation of that character much depends upon association and education, for it is molded in the important surroundings which God in his wise dispensation ap-pointed for their happiness, their social development and moral govern-ment. In harmony with the design of His creation, man has been endowed with grand and superior attributes, to qualify him for his Heavenappointed position as ruler of earth. That qualification consists in a proper practical education of head and heart and hands—an education superior to mere artificial accomplishments because of its adaptation to the utilitarian spirit of the age and the life-work of the people.

The civilization of the present is progressive and aggressive, and its practical requirements, its increasing avenues of industry, its stringent political economies, its far-reaching influences, all demand that those educational agencies be employed best adapted to the development of its meaning intellegation and industrial energies. its moral, social, intellectual, and industrial energies. These agencies will be found in that system that contains the elements of productive education. Legislators, statesmen, philanthropists, moralists, educators, direct your energies, your talents, your time, and your means to this great national necessity. Then will your dreams of a higher civilization, of a purer private and public morality, of more personal independtion, of a purer private and public morality, of more personal independence and national prosperity, of more stable institutions and perpetual government be realized; for it will lessen crime, diminish pauperism, stimulate and diversify labor, elevate character, promote individual and public morality, multiply your industries, and give you men not only for society, but for the field, the workshop, the factory, the mine, the forum, the pulpit, and men for the commonwealth. Happy anticipation of glorious results. It fills the patriot's heart with joy and bids him withhold not his song of thanksgiving. If, then, it is to be the policy of this Government to build up an educational system in the States, I pray you inaugurate one which will embrace moral culture, industrial training, and technical knowledge, for upon this system alone industrial training, and technical knowledge, for upon this system alone can be built the superstructure of a people's greatness and a nation's Rivers and Harbors.

SPEECH

HON. THOMAS M. BROWNE. OF INDIANA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 24, 1885.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes—

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: While I am in the fullest sympathy with those who oppose this bill, I have at no time during all this weary discussion oboppose this office at no time during all this weary discussion obstructed its consideration. At all times I have favored meeting the important questions presented by it fairly, and submitting them to a vote on their merits. The responsibility of the legislation is on the majority, and there I propose it shall, so far as I am concerned, abide. I am not vain enough, sir, to think that any word of mine will change a vote, and I now offer a formal amendment solely for the purpose of putting on the record the reasons which lead me to vote against this meas-Having stated these reasons I will not again trespass on the patience of the committee nor interpose further to delay final action. Sir, portions of this bill are doubtless fit to pass into law, but as these can not be separated from the waste and extravagance of its other parts, I will vote against the whole of it.

In the first place I protest against the methods of river and harbor legislation as an ingeniously devised plan for catching votes from all sections by mixing large rivers and little rivers and no rivers with lakes, seas, inlets, canals, wharves, creeks, and every possible water way, nat-ural or artificial, navigable or unnavigable, in the same bill and baiting each with an appropriation. A little brook grows to marvelous proportions under the influence of a generous appropriation. One of the manifest evils of this omnibus system of legislation is that it harnesses wise and ill-advised measures together and literally coerces Representatives to vote for the bad as the only means of securing the benefits of those of real merit. Here, in this bill, are expenditures that ought not to be made—expenditures that are but spoliations of the Treasury—inseparably tacked upon others demanded by the interests of national commerce, and we must accept both or get neither. Why load down the good by the vicious? Why not try every item on its own merits? Do not tell me that these expenditures are subjected to this test, for the contrary is within the knowledge of almost every gentleman here. How many are there this very day, sir, openly opposing this bill because their sections do not, as they think, sufficiently share in its bounties, and how many support it with zeal for no higher reason than is expressed by the slang phrase that has fallen from so many lips in this debate, "that they get some of the pork."

I submit, sir, that this is not statesmanship; that we should not thus deal with great public interests. For one I will not vote for a bill that squanders $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 of the people's money to secure the benefits of $10,000,000 judiciously appropriated. I must do this, in my judgment, if I support this bill.

During the debate on the river and harbor bill a year ago I had the temerity to assert the belief that the proposed improvement of the Mississippi River would be a failure, and as a consequence the expenditure a colossal waste. I think time and experience are demonstrating the correctness of that opinion. We inaugurated this system supposing its completion on the Lower Mississippi would involve an expenditure of less than $40,000,000, but it is now admitted that $150,000,000 will be required. This sum exceeds the total of all our past appropriations for the improvement of our national water ways. A stretch of river between Cairo and the Gulf is to swallow a sum exceeding all our expenditures for one hundred years for the benefit of our water naviga-tion. In the presence of an expenditure so immense the representatives of the people may well hesitate. There should be assurance that success will follow the investment before the money is voted.

My chief objection to this bill, I confess, sir, is its purpose to sink additional millions in the plan of the Mississippi River Commission, which is at best but an experiment. I make no pretense to a knowledge of the science of engineering, but our every-day observations are often more valuable than the conjectures and speculations of the scientific. In the debate to which I have made reference, in a brief discussion of this point, I said:

often more valuable than the conjectures and speculations of the scientific. In the debate to which I have made reference, in a brief discussion of this point, I said:

Mr. Chairman, I simply take the floor at this time for the purpose of saying that I believe it, will be demonstrated in the future that this Mississippi liver improvement plan is the colossal waste and extravagance of the age. I do not are it, in the improvement of the navigation of the river, is should result in reflecting all of the immediated lands along the margin of the river—dust lin reflecting all of the immediated lands along the margin of the river—dust lin reflecting all of the immediated lands along the margin of the river—dust lin reflecting all of the immediated lands along the margin of the river—dust lin reflecting and the reflecting and the reflecting all the reflecting and the reflecting and the reflecting all the reflecting and the reflecting and

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that the plan of the commission is con-demned by engineers of skill and of acknowledged learning. Less than a year ago I received a letter on this subject from a gentleman of high attainments and of large experience in hydrographic engineering. This gentleman was at one time an employé of the commission, and is at present sewerage commissioner of the city of Saint Louis. I refer to Robert E. McMath, esq.; and permit me now to read portions of his letter. He says:

Robert E. McMath, esq.; and permit me now to read portions of his letter. He says:

Your remarks in the House on the bill appropriating $1,000,000 to the Mississippi lead me to address you. If you inquire who I am, I refer you to page 488 of current Record, where you will find my name as first on the list of employes of the River Commission, and my record can be traced continuously in United States Engineer reports back to 1866, then in Coast Survey to 1862. I have therefore had opportunity to know whereof I speak. As to the propriety of my speaking, the following from my letter to the Mississippi Commission, giving my reasons for resigning my position, will suffice:

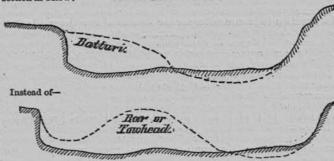

"I am not in sympathy with the majority of the commission in their opinion as to the value of levees. Being fully convinced that the levee, so far from being a useful adjunct to channel improvement, is actually opposed thereto, I can not consistently occupy a position which involves a tacit acquiescence in the official policy."

You are entirely correct in saying that the weight of intelligent, scientific, and professional opinion is against the commission; and I think too little use is made of the fact that one of the commission is decided in his dissent from the conclusions of the majority, and that upon a vital point.

The points of the issue as now made up are:

First. The fundamental principle of the commission is misapplied, as will appear when their argument is reduced to syllogistic form. Major premise: Permanent increase of normal volume will cause enlargement of bed and eventually lessen the surface slope and lower the river in its bed. (True with limitations.) Minor premise: Levees permanently increase the normal volume. (Untrue in every sense.) Conclusion: Levees will lower the river in its bed, and so do away with overflow, while the enlarged bed will insure good navigation. (Untrue in every particular.)

Second, Levees were favored at the outset by the commission as "desirable adjuncts" to a plan of channel improvement. Grant what is Both forms contract the water way, and both may for a time deepen the channel. Measured in cubic yards of deposit, or area of water surface changed into bar, dry at low stage, the one may be as great as the other, but in the matter of progress toward a permanent improvement one is real, the latter a delusion. Third. The commission proposes to reconstruct levees below Red River, to prepare that section for a "volume much in excess of any known discharge," admitting that they expect and design to produce general enlargement of the river-bed by scouring. The first effect of scour would be to destroy the stable conditions now existing on the lower river. When and how will a new stable condition be established? The common-sense principle of "let well enough alone" ought to refute all the pretentious nonsense that could be written in favor of such a dangerous scheme.

I consider that I am serving my generation well in lifting a warning voice against the Mississippi scheme as it now stands.

I am not analified to add anything to this reasoning. It speaks with

I am not qualified to add anything to this reasoning. It speaks with "a warning voice," and we should pause and demand proofs of success before we proceed further with this giant enterprise.

It will be remembered that Hon. Robert E. Taylor, a member of the commission, in a very able argument defended its plan of improve-ment, and attempted to demonstrate its success by reference to specific instances in which the levee system had been tested. In answer to this my correspondent says:

this my correspondent says:

Mr. Robert Taylor, in his article "How to Improve the Mississippi," in the North American Review for March, makes a very plausible argument for levees. Fortunately for the truth, he appeals to specific facts as supporting the theory. Every one of these cases, when fully stated and correctly interpreted, condemns concentration of flood volume. I showed this in a report to the commission, which, if not suppressed, will be printed in the report now in printer's hands. If Mr. Taylor knew of that document his use of the facts with incomplete statements of circumstances was willful perversion. If he did not know of it, either the committee on reservoirs, to which the report was made, concealed it from other members of the commission and kept them in ignorance, or else Mr. Taylor is convicted of forming his judgment without considering the evidence, I proved by the record that the Grafton case was wholly due to backed water while the Missouri was in flood; Hays Landing, to backed water while the Yazoo flood was discharging, and therefore overflow did not cause diminution of discharge or pile up the flood. The Clayton case is a crucial test of their theory, and condemns it, for the decrease of velocity occurred before overflow; and in the May rise, which did not reach overflow, the same decrease occurred—the effect when their assigned cause was wanting.

Mr. Taylor is an intelligent and most conscientious gentleman, and I have read this letter simply to show how his argument is met on a vital point by one who is equally honorable and perhaps better informed as to the facts than himself. I am sure Mr. Taylor has little doubt of the ultimate success of the commission plan, but I hazard nothing in saying that while this is true he admits that it is an experiment that may fail, and he believes it should be thoroughly tested at the Plum Point and Lake Providence reaches before proceeding further.

Since the last Congress several men of large experience in the navigation of our western rivers have written me on this subject. They agree in condemning the commission plan. I will give a brief extract from a letter of Mr. J. B. French, of Rising Sun, Ind. He writes:

from a letter of Mr. J. B. French, of Rising Sun, Ind. He writes:

Having noticed the proceedings of Congress, and having given some attention to that portion relating to the improvement of the Mississippi River, I would like to give my views about it. I will state that I am one of the oldest river-men now living on the shores of the Ohio. I boated continually for over forty years and have run on every kind of boat propelled by steam or floated by water. I commanded one of the first gunboats during the war. * * I am satisfied that all that can be done to improve the navigation of the Mississippi is to employ enough snag and dredge boats to remove the snags and bars. * * Signal lights should be kept at the regular crossings. The river runs between banks of sand and goes wherever the body of water is strongest, and no artificial means will change it. The work done won't stand two freshets. It will all wash away. * * The Government built three dams below the falls many years ago; one at French Island, one at Three Mile Island, and one at Scuffletown Bar. When completed they stood six feet above low-water mark, but after the first high water you couldn't see a sign of either of them. A similar improvement made at the head of the Rising Sun Bar was all washed away, and this will be the fate of the work being done on the Mississippi River.

Cantain French, in other portions of his letter, gives his knowledge of Captain French, in other portions of his letter, gives his knowledge of the effects of floods on the levees of the Lower Mississippi, and expresses the belief that no possible system of embankments will be able to con-fine the waters of the river within any reasonable channel. These are the views of a practical common-sense man-one who makes no pretensions to science, but who speaks from observation. He may be wrong. Those who oppose this expenditure may all be wrong, but I insist that they at least furnish reasons that make it our duty to stop and inquire before we further deplete the Treasury. I will detain the committee no longer. There are many other objections I would be glad to notice, but they must pass until some other occasion.

No Taxation to Create Office for the Benefit of Privileged Classes.

SPEECH

HON. ETHELBERT BARKSDALE.

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 3, 1885,

On the bill to create the office of General of the Army for the benefit of ex-President U. S. Grant.

Mr. BARKSDALE said:

Mr. SPEAKER: To state the case precisely as it is, the object of the pending bill is to create a life office requiring no service, and bestowing pending bill is to create a fire office requiring no service, and bestowing a very large salary upon ex-President Grant. It proposes to take him from private life and put him on the retired-list of the Army, with the rank and grade of General of the Army of the United States, and with pay and emoluments amounting to $19,000 a year. Republicans who support it are actuated by partisan and sectional feelings. Democrats who favor it are prompted, as they frankly acknowledge, not by devotion to a sound principle of public policy, but to satisfy an unjust clamor which has been raised in some of the Northern States in consequence of pecuniary reverses that have overtaken the firm of which General Grant was a member, by reason of transactions of a questionable character.

A similar bill was before Congress soon after General Grant was thwarted in his ambition to be elected President for a third term, but, heeding the indignant remonstrance of the people on whom the burden of the proposed favoritism would have fallen, their representatives rejected it. The failure to pass it consigned it to the limbo of discarded schemes, and it was dismissed from the public mind. This is the condition in which it was placed by the judgment of the people when the members of the present Congress were chosen. Having reaped the emoluments of the highest military office under the Government for a term of years having enjoyed the wincely salary of President of the emoluments of the inglest military office under the Government for a term of years, having enjoyed the princely salary of President of the United States for eight years, which was doubled in its pay and quadrupled in its contingent emoluments for his benefit, having received voluntary contributions from partial friends (some of whom had become millionaires during his term of office) amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars, General Grant closed his public career rich in money and in all the goods of this world. It would seem that he invested a part of this enormous wealth in a stock-jobbing enterprise, and lost by reckless endeavors to accumulate still more. In consequence of this loss, and avowedly to indemnify him at the expense of the people, the scheme to create a life office with a high salary has been revived. Its merits depend solely upon the ground that it is the duty of Congress to step aside from its prescribed sphere of action, take cognizance of the private affairs of ex-President Grant, and insure his losses by an appropriation from the public Treasury. This is the meaning of the appropriation from the public Treasury. bill; nothing more, nothing less.

Inasmuch as its advocates have based their support of it on the ground that it is a benefaction that should be bestowed upon a citizen who has rendered valuable service to the country and whose condition is necessitous, it is proper to state that they have not even that insufficient pretext. Ex-President Grant has a permanent investment of $250,000, which is entirely unaffected by the wreck of the financial ventures of Grant, Ward & Co. in Wall street. In proof of this assertion I will produce the uncontradicted statement of Mr. George W. Jones, of New York, through whose efforts the fund of $250,000, yielding an annual interest of $15,000, was raised. I will quote from the statement of Mr. Jones in the New York Herald of November 30, 1884:

It has been extensively circulated that the literary work of General Grant was all that the ex-President had to live upon during the coming years of his life, and therefore an interview was sought with George Jones, editor and proprietor of the New York Times, to whose exertions the raising of a trust fund of $250,000 in behalf of General Grant some years back was almost entirely due, Mr. Jones in a business-like way responded to all pertinent queries.

"I'll tell you all about this," said Mr. Jones. "When the fund of $250,000 was complete, desiring to invest it in some permanent and safe way, I counseled with ex-Governor Morgan, who advised that it be invested in Wabash stock. I suggested that perhaps Governments would be better, as I could put it where a certainty of 6 per cent. per annum could be returned. The Governor explained to me that his suggestion applied to a section only of the Wabash road, which involved an investment only of some $2,000,000, from which the income was almost a certainty.

"For what, said I, 'would you guarantee the income?"

"He replied that for 5 per cent. he would guarantee $15,000 a year for ten consecutive years. Whereupon I made the arrangement."

"Has that been regularly paid?"

"It has, down to date."

"Without exception?"

"Well, there was one time when it was not paid for a few weeks, but upon the representation that it would be paid—as it since has been—we did not press the estate of Governor Morgan for the guarantee. It is arranged between the executors, as it was with Governor Morgan, that in default of the payment by the road the principal and interest should be returned to us, in behalf of General Grant. That is as certain as anything can be in life. The original fund can not be touched and the per annum income is assured."

"Of one thing the public may be certain—the money was raised by Grant's friends for Grant. It has been safely invested, and its income is abundantly guaranteed. It was raised for Grant and Grant alone will have it."

This statement shows that if it is the duty of Congress to create the proposed sinecure for ex-President Grant on the ground of his poverty, the cause does not exist; hence, there can be no necessity for straining the Constitution to repair his losses by enforced taxation of

The bill is in disregard of the real object of establishing a retired-list The bill is in disregard of the real object of establishing a retired-list of the Army. The policy of a retired-list is founded upon the consideration that the pay of the officer is fixed at a rate so low as barely to afford him the means of living. Consequently when by long service or injuries received in the line of duty he is incapacitated for further service, it was deemed proper to place him on the list with enough pay to support him in his declining years.

To "retire" an officer presupposes him to be in the service. The beneficiary of this bill is not in the service; nor can it be said that a fortune of $250,000, with an assured yearly income of $15,000, is inadefortune of $250,000, with an assured yearly income of $15,000, is inade-quate to his support. So far from being in the military service, he "re-tired" himself from it sixteen years ago for a consideration so valuable that neither he nor the country can have forgotten it. He left the Army voluntarily, that he might be clothed with the highest honors of the world—the Chief Magistracy of the United States.

The proposed measure is without precedent, as it is without even the The proposed measure is without precedent, as it is without even the shadow of justification. It is said that the office of Commander-in-Chief was created for George Washington after he had been President and had retired to the shades of Mount Vernon. But it is a calumny upon the memory of those who did it, to assert that it was intended to give him money, or to heap accumulated honors upon the head of him who was first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen. It was to place him at the head of the Army in the threatened war with France. General Washington accepted the appointment with reluctance, and upon the condition that his pay should not commence until he had actually entered upon the duties of the office. There was no war: the conditions upon which the office was created failed, and the war; the conditions upon which the office was created failed, and the law was repealed. It is instructive to quote the language of General Washington in accepting the trust:

Washington in accepting the trust:

Feeling how incumbent it is upon every person of every description to contribute at all times to his country's welfare, and especially in a moment like the present, when everything we hold dear and sacred is so seriously threatened, I have finally determined to accept the position of Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, with the reserve only that I shall not be called into the field until the army is in a situation to require my presence, or until it becomes necessary by the urgency of circumstances. * * I take the liberty also to mention that I must decline having my acceptance considered as drawing after it any immediate charge upon the public, or that I can receive any emoluments annexed to the appointment before I am in a situation to incur expense.—Marshall's Life of Washington, volume 2, page 437.

The proposed measure is a violation of the objects for which our Government was founded. It is a departure from the fundamental idea figuratively expressed by Thomas Jefferson, that no class of mankind was born booted and spurred to ride over the rest. It is a long stride toward the establishment of privileged orders, which involves the overthrow of what was designed to be a plain government of the people and for the people; in disregard of the earnest warning of Andrew Jackand for the people; in disregard of the earnest warning of Andrew Jackson, that it is not in a splendid government, supported by powerful monopolies and aristocratic establishments, that the people will find happiness, and protection for their liberties, but in a just system, dealing equally with all and granting especial favors to none.

If there is one question more than any other about which my conviction is clear, it is that this measure is unjust to the people, unautically the the Constitution and the establishment of a degreeness.

thorized by the Constitution, and the establishment of a dangerous precedent. I would utter my solemn protest and record my vote against it, if I stood alone.

Alien Land-Owners in America.

Great estates destroy the spirit of patriotism in those who have everything and in those who have nothing.—Saint Pierre.

SPEECH

HON. JAMES H. HOPKINS.

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 18, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 2605) limiting the quantity of public lands which may be acquired or held by aliens within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. HOPKINS said:

Mr. Speaker: No inspired prophet nor profane seer ever uttered a more pregnant warning than Goldsmith when he wrote:

Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey, Where wealth accumulates, and men decay.

The primal curse, "in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread," carried with it some individual compensations; and it is quite certain carried with it some individual compensations; and it is quite certain that that community is most prosperous where all men are producers. As idleness is debilitating and demoralizing, so industry and activity promote health and mental and physical vigor; and the greater the accumulation of application and force, the greater will be the development of the manhood of the people and the aggregate of its progress and

The power of wealth is not to be denied, but its power to curse is quite equal to its power to bless; and the unquestionable rule is that its concomitants and results are evil. The notable and noble exceptions in which it elevates and cheers and leaves its benediction upon mankind only make the rule all the more melancholy. Of the great, the gifted, and the good, whose words and deeds light up the pages of history, how few there are whose ambition had wealth for a handmaid, and how many whose incentive was inexorable necessity! And among the nations of the world from the beginning of time those have been the most powerful, prosperous, and happy where wealth has been most generally distributed. The philosophy of this is perfectly manifest. As the number of those having a substantial interest in a government increases there is a natural increase of the zealous defenders and earnest promoters of the welfare of that government.

If a few monopolize all the luxuries and appropriate most of the comforts of life, the many grow discontented and restless under suffering. And then, too, the possessors of great wealth are apt to intensify this feeling by an aggressive and inconsiderate exercise of their power. Power of all kinds seeks to increase and perpetuate itself, and is rarely tolerant in its use or scrupulous in its growth. And so while the tolerant in its use or scrupulous in its growth. And so while the rich become richer the poor necessarily become poorer. At length oppression breeds revolt; and the masses, maddened by despair, feeling they have already lost all, seek to obtain by force that which has long been denied them by peaceful means. Bayonets may pin them down and hold them in subjection, but the loyal love of the people is crushed, and their distress is a constant menace to the government under which

Without pausing now to moralize upon the dissoluteness and vice into which the weaker possessors of great wealth are led, and the consequent enfeebling of their manhood and the pollution of the moral tone of society, I suggest this as another of the drawbacks and dangers to the stability and prosperity of the Government.

REPUBLIC'S SAFETY IN DIFFUSION OF WEALTH.

Mr. Speaker, these general truths have a special force when applied to republics, where large standing armies are obnoxious; where caste and classes are especially odious; where the government is built upon and upheld by popular suffrage. As Andrew Jackson well said:

It is not in a splendid government, supported by powerful monopolies and aristocratic establishments, that our people find their happiness or their liberties

Our fathers builded with a wisdom almost, if not altogether, inspired when they erected our substantial, simple, but beautiful fabric, broadbased upon the people's will. If we would preserve that foundation in its original solidity and strength, we must take care that it is not undermined by discontent which grows out of a sense of wrong, nor overloaded by a gilded monarchical architecture grossly out of harmony with the grand design.

DANGERS OF LAND MONOPOLY.

Of all forms of wealth, that which confers the greatest power, and is, therefore, the most dangerous to any government, is the accumulation of vast bodies of land. A dependent tenantry, having no interest or hope of acquiring an interest in the soil, are but little better than vassals, and the owners of the fee are but little less than liege lords.

The ownership of a man's domicile, of the roof which covers his wife and children, is a power which fetters his freedom. What will a poor man not surrender to preserve a shelter for his family? The political power of a large landlord has been too often and too strikingly exhibited in England to need any argument to prove its danger in a republic. To be a freeholder carries with it a degree of freedom and independence. The man who can sit under his own vine and fig tree, who can set up his lares and penates in the sanctuary of his own home, feels dignified by the very fact, and is bound by gratitude and love to the government in which he feels he has a share and which secures and protects him in his domestic joys. No emotion of patriotism is so potent, no oath of allegiance so binding, as the consciousness that one has a material interest in the country, that its stability and prosperity will bless his house-hold, and that he will have a share in all its glory and in all its power.

THE RIGHT OF GOVERNMENT OVER LAND-OWNING.

In view of these indisputable facts it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the policy and duty of our Government are plain. We should promote as far as possible the diffusion of wealth, not by any communistic leveling nor by any forced equalization of the results of individual enterprise and effort, but by encouraging and aiding the willing, by curbing the political power of wealth in so far as government may properly do so, and by prohibiting the acquisition by any one of immense areas of land and by increasing the number of freeholders throughout the coun-while government may not prevent or control the amassing by individuals of millions of dollars in personal property, it certainly may, and as certainly should, prevent all monopolies in land and all vast holdings which retard the growth and productivness of the country, and serve only to build up a power inimical to the spirit of our insti-tutions. I do not know, sir, that the power of the Government in this respect will be denied. The principle strikes me as indisputable; but to fortify principle with authority I refer to Vattel's Law of Nations, book 1, chapter 7, section 78, where the argument and the logical result are so clearly set forth:

The sovereign ought to neglect no means of rendering the land under his jurisdiction as well cultivated as possible. He ought not to allow either communities or private persons to acquire large tracts of land to leave them uncultivated. Those rights of common which deprive the proprietor of the free liberty of disposing of his land, which will not allow him to inclose and cultivate it in the most advantageous manner, those rights, I say, are infinical to the welfare of the state and ought to be pressed or reduced to just bounds. Notwithstanding the introduction of private property among the citizens the nation has still a right to take the most effectual measures to cause the aggregate soil of the country to produce the greatest and most advantageous revenue possible.

THE POLICY OF OUR FATHERS ON LAND DISTRIBUTION.

And the fathers of the Republic well understood the wisdom of that policy. It is true that immediately after the close of the Revolution the financial stress of the young Republic caused it to place in the market large blocks of land and to induce capitalists to invest. But in the plan for the disposition of the public lands prepared and submitted to Congress by Alexander Hamilton in 1790 he made provismitted to Congress by Alexander Hamilton in 1790 he made provision for actual settlers only secondary to the discharge of the moneyed obligations of the country. And on March 3, 1801, Congress enacted the first "pre-emption" law. The fundamental idea of pre-emption privilege is to encourage actual settlers to go upon the public domain to build up houses and cultivate the soil. Thus early our national legislators discriminated in favor of the producers, the actual settlers, and against investors and speculators. The limitation of the quantity of land which each person might hold in this way was in the line of judicious action pointed out by Vattel. In furtherance of this same thought subsequent acts were passed; and in 1834 the tracts were subdivided into forty-acre lots, which, at the low price exacted, stimulated the energies and encouraged the hopes of the humblest, and at the same time added to the productive wealth of the nation. same time added to the productive wealth of the nation.

But our Government went vastly beyond this in the same direction in 1862 when it enacted the homestead law. This inaugurated a new system, patriotic in its purposes, generous in its bounty, prolific in its results. Under its provisions the rich, broad acres smile a cordial welcome to the husbandman and strip their bosom of the wild flowers, that the healed wounds of the plowshare may soon be hid by a golden and gorgeous harvest. And while the desert is being made to blossom, waste places are becoming the happy homes of sturdy defenders of our country? flow country's flag.

It is true that unwise and profligate legislation of recent years has despoiled the people of much of their richest patrimony. But it is in the power of faithful guardians to redress much of this great wrong and to arrest further encroachments of corporations and monopolists, and to preserve the residue of our domain for cultivation by our own citizens, who bear their full share of the nation's burdens and responsibilities.

THE DANGER FROM ALIEN LAND-OWNERS-OUR DUTY.

Mr. Speaker, I affirm that it is unwise, unjust, and unpatriotic to permit aliens, who owe no allegiance to our Republic, who have no interest in its prosperity, to seize upon the inheritance of its sons and to enrich foreign and possibly hostile governments with the wealth which should bless our own people and strengthen the power of our own nation.

LEGAL RIGHT TO PROHIBIT ABSORPTION OF THE PUBLIC DOMAIN BY ALIENS,

This country was dedicated as an asylum for the oppressed of all lands, and so it must remain forever. All who make this their home lands, and so it must remain forever. All who make this their home by voluntary adoption will be ever welcome. Those who assume the duties of citizenship shall always freely enjoy its rights and privileges. None other have any claim but that of ordinary hospitality. And it is wrong and unnatural to take the children's portion and give it unto strangers. The nation's duty in this regard was prescribed in the code of laws inspired direct from Heaven; and it is recognized in the common law of England, from which we derive our jurisprudence. In the first volume of Blackstone, 371–372, it is said:

If an alien could acquire a permanent property in lands he must owe an allegiance equally permanent with that property * * * which would probably be inconsistent with that which he owes to his own native liege lord; besides that, thereby the nation might be subject to foreign influence and feel many other inconveniences. Wherefore by the civil law such contracts were made absolutely void.

The reasons why an alien may not become an owner of the soil are strongly put in Calvin's case (7 Rep., 27):

1. The secrets of the realm might be thereby discovered. 2. The revenues of the realm (the sinews of war) would be taken and enjoyed by strangers. 3. It tends to the destruction of the realm by admitting strangers to fortify in the heart of the kingdom." (Note in 2 Blackstone, 249.) 2. The revenues of by strangers, 3. It

And it is further held that-

Alienation of lands to an alien is cause of forfeiture * * * because of his incapacity to hold them. (2 Blackstone, 274-293.)

Vattel (Book 2, chap. 8, sec. 114, p. 677) states this as a recognized principle of the law of nations:

principle of the law of nations:

Every state has the liberty of granting or refusing to foreigners the power of possessing lands or other immovable property within her territory. * * * If the sovereign does not permit aliens to possess immovable property nobody has a right to complain of such prohibition; for he may have very good reasons for acting in this manner, and as foreigners can not claim any right in his territory, they ought not to take it amiss that he makes use of his power and of his right in the manner which he thinks most for the advantage of the state. And as the sovereign may refuse to foreigners the privilege of possessing immovable property, he is doubtless at liberty to forbear granting it except with certain conditions anyexed.

A more modern writer, while admitting the right of a government to exclude foreigners from even temporary residence in its territory, doubts the wisdom of exercising that power under ordinary circumstances. But he adds that-

This right obviously includes the right of enacting that no foreigner shall become the proprietor of any part of that territory. The ownership of a foreign landholder may, upon the same principle, be subjected by the law of the occupant state to any special restrictions or burdens which may be thought expedient. (Phillips on Jurisprudence, sections 385-416.)

In this country the same general power of the Government is recognized, but its application has been liberalized by the spirit of our institutions and of our age.

In 2 Kent's Commentaries, page 62, it is said:

An alien may purchase and hold, but is in danger of being divested of the fee and having his land forfeited to the State upon inquest of office found. And if the alien sell land, the prerogative right of forfeiture is not barred by the alienation.

(See also Bouv. Law Dic., vol. 1, title "Alien," and numerous cases there cited.)

MODERN LEGISLATION MORE LIBERAL-THE RESULTS.

In the early days of our Republic a fear of foreign influence prompted the enforcement of the disabilities of aliens; and in almost every State the common-law doctrine prevailed that aliens could not hold real estate. But as we have become more self-reliant, and perhaps more impatient to dispose of our public lands and replenish the Treasury, the former policy has been relaxed. And I believe there are now but four States in which aliens are incompetent to own real property. States are Alabama, Maryland, North Carolina, and Vermont.

The prohibition is in part removed in Illinois, New York, Rhode Island, Tennessee, and Virginia. In Arkansas, Delaware, Georgia, and South Carolina there is no inhibition after the foreigner has declared his intention of becoming a citizen.

Residence only is required in California, Kentucky, Mississippi, Missouri, and New Hampshire. Texas requires a declaration of intention as well as actual residence. All disabilities have been removed in Connecticut, Florida, Iowa, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin.

In 1838 an effort was made to confine the benefits of the pre-emption leave to different the United States. Partit followed the Application.

law to citizens of the United States. But it failed, and the public lands are open to settlement by whoever chooses to occupy them upon filing a mere declaration of intention to become citizens; and even without such declaration millions of acres may be purchased in some of our States by an alien, and a non-resident at that.

Look at the result. The crowded populations of the Old World, tempted by the allurements of free or cheap homes in America, are swarming to our shores. And it is authoritatively stated that fully third of all foreigners arriving enter upon the public lands. We have densely populated cities, with too many poor and homeless people; periods of depression come upon all manufacturing and mining enterprises, and the surplus of idle men anxious for work is thereby increased. Surely it would be much wiser statesmanship to facilitate and aid in locating this class of our own citizens upon the unoccupied lands and make them self-supporting, while they swell the volume of the nation's wealth, rather than by an improvident bonus bribe to come here a heterogeneous mass of adventurers.

ABSENTEE LANDLORDS UNDESIRABLE.

But, Mr. Speaker, this influx of people who know nothing and care nothing about our form of government, whose immigration is prompted solely by sordid motives, is not the greatest danger we have to fear from our injudicious disposition of the public lands. One of the greatest curses of much-afflicted Ireland is her system of absentee landlordism. Much of her land is owned by men who seldom or never visit their possessions; who have no sympathy with the natives; who care nothing for their tenants except to wring from them every possible dollar of rental, which they spend in luxury abroad. Learning nothing from the history of that unhappy island, we are permitting the same system to be fastened upon many of our communities.

The glittering accounts of our prolific soil and the immense area of our pasture lands soon caught the eye of European capitalists. And our railroad companies, with a thrifty purpose of their own, stimulated the interest already aroused by free excursions in well-stocked palace cars, by which noblemen and other men of wealth saw the bounteousness of our prairies through the sparkle of champagne and the delicate smoke of pure Havanas; and the enormous returns which foreign investors received from their American cattle ranches still further inflamed the cupidity of their countrymen, and many others sought these rich fields of ALARMING EXTENT OF ALIEN HOLDINGS.

A year ago the London Economist felt called upon to try to check the spreading movement. It published a list of ten companies whose stock commanded a premium to five which were slightly below par. The journal referred to said:

Within a few months of their establishment a number of these companies had paid remarkably high dividends, and as this course had been pursued in the face of imperfect data and by writing up the value of their cattle—the market value of which had undoubtedly-been rising rapidly—we took occasion to point out that those concerns had been over-hasty in dividing such profits, and that the mania for such undertakings which was then in progress in Dundee and Edinburgh, and which threatened to spread to London, was unwise.

But with dividends running up to almost 30 per cent. foreign capital eagerly seized upon the opportunity which our inconsiderateness presented, and already more than 20,000,000 acres have been absorbed by aliens. Allowing eighty acres to each household, we have thus permitted homesteads of 250,000 families, or a population of a million souls, to be wrested from us. We have recklessly permitted the birthright of our own people to be despoiled.

I have here an imperfect list of the holdings of aliens which ought to startle our legislators to a realizing sense of the public danger and of their manifest duty:

Remembering the millions more williage.

Remembering the millions upon millions of acres given away to enrich corporations, and these other millions which non-resident aliens have been allowed to acquire, we will be unjust to the present generation, unfaithful to those yet unborn, and untrue to the best interests of our country if we hesitate to stop this wasteful policy.

SQUATTER ROBBERS-THE GOVERNMENT'S DUTY.

But, Mr. Speaker, objectionable and alarming as is the exhibit I have already presented, there are still more shameful facts to be confronted. Not content with that which could legally be acquired under our lax legislation, there has been bold and defiant robbery of millions of acres of our public lands, without the payment of a single dollar to the Government, without the faintest shadow of title, without the slightest pretext of right. Foreigners have impudently seized upon, appropriated, inclosed, and are using vast areas of our land. The Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his report for 1883, says that, with limited means for investigation, "there were 1,237 cases of fraudulent entry reported." He also says:

The practice of inclosing public lands by private persons and companies for exclusive use as stock ranges is extensively continued in States and Territories west of the Mississippi River. These ranges sometimes cover several hundred thousand acres.

In his last report the Commissioner says:

Three thousand five hundred and thirty-one alleged fraudulent entries have een examined, and about 5,000 are awaiting investigation.

He further states that-

Thirty-two cases of illegal fencing of public lands have been examined and reported. The area inclosed in these cases aggregates 4,431,980 acres. * * * The extent to which public lands are so fenced may be inferred from the large amount found inclosed in the small number of cases examined.

It is not claimed that all of these depredators are foreigners, but many of them are, and all of them deserve the condemnation of an outraged people and such penalties as highwaymen suffer. The crime is aggravated, in that it is a double robbery of the nation and of her homeless citizens. No other nation upon earth would tolerate such a wrong to her citizens, such a wholesale larceny of her resources, such an insult to her dignity. A mere trespasser upon royal domains, a sportsman or a poacher who might kill a deer or rabbit upon royal preserves, would feel the swift vengeance of violated law. But the majesty of our Government is mocked, while her forests are being cut down and carried away, her pasture lands are appropriated, and her game is being murdered to give nobility a summer holiday!

In view of these facts we may well inquire—

Why prosecute the man or woman Who steals the goose from off the common, But leave the greater felon loose Who steals the common from the goose?

We talk about enforcing the Monroe doctrine to prevent undue foreign influence, and yet we tamely look on while foreign capital and foreign power are fortifying themselves in our very midst and are in-solently defying our nation's authority over her own domain. Surely it is time to call a halt. If we may not recover the lands legally held by aliens, we can and must sweep away the unlawful "squatters," and declare to all the world that our public lands shall henceforth be reserved for homesteads for our own citizens or as a bounty to the brave defenders of our flag.

BENEFICIAL EFFECTS OF SMALL HOLDINGS.

Mr. Speaker, I have already alluded to the right of the Government to secure the largest possible products from her aggregate soil. And I think there can be no question that the greatest results can be secured by the most general distribution of the ownership of land. Can there be any question of the comparative revenue from 80,000 acres owned by one man and that which would be derived from the same area divided among a thousand, each having the pride of ownership and stimulated by the knowledge that every improvement made, that every dollar's increase in value of product, will bring additional comforts to his own household?

In an elaborate review of "The present aspect of the land question," by William Fowler, M. P. (Cobden Club Essays, second series, page 165), the writer is constrained to say:

After perusing the reports of Her Majesty's representatives as to the tenure of land in Europe, I think any dispassionate person must admit that the ownership of small properties by a great number of peasants tends to the diffusion of happiness and comfort among the rural population to an extent to which we are too little accustomed.

And again (page 154), speaking of the tenant farmers, he says:

However abundant is the harvest gathered, they only gain indirectly, and they would be more than human if they labored for others as they would labor for themselves.

M. De Laveleye states the true philosophy of the distribution of land in these words:

The distribution of a number of small properties among the peasantry forms a kind of rampartand safeguard for the holders of large estates, and peasant property may, without exaggeration, be called the lightning conductor, that averts from society dangers which might otherwise lead to violent catastrophes.

DISTRIBUTION OF LAND IN EUROPE

In France it was estimated before the loss of Alsace and Lorraine that 5,000,000 proprietors owned on the average seven and one-half acres each; that 500,000 proprietors of a higher class owned on the average seventy-five acres each, and that 50,000 great proprietors owned on the average seven hundred and fifty acres each. In 1858, in the Rhine provinces and Westphalia, the average holding of each proprietor was but ten acres. In the rest of Prussia there were 1,300,000 proprietors, of whom one hundred and eight only had estates large enough to be rated over $7,500, and only about 16,000 had estates of more than four hundred acres, while about 350,000 had estates varying from twenty to four hundred acres, and the rest, some 925,000, owned less than twenty acres each.

Hon. George C. Brodrick, in a treatise upon "English lands and English landlords" (page 453-454), after reviewing the policy of different European governments, says:

Foreign experience teaches us that the instincts of proprietorship are cherished with the utmost intensity by peasant owners, who show mutual respect for the rights of property far beyond that which prevails in England.

This statement is entitled to all the greater weight in view of the proverbial pride which Englishmen feel in the laws, customs, and condition of their country.

In Mr. Brodrick's work I find the following authentic and instructive table:

Summary table of England and Wales.

Class.	Number of owners.	Extent in acres.
Peers and peeresses. Great land-owners. 'Squires. Great yeomen. Lesser yeomen. Small proprietors. Cottagers. Public bodies:	1, 288 2, 529 9, 585 24, 412	5, 728, 979 8, 497, 699 4, 319, 271 4, 782, 627 4, 144, 272 3, 931, 806 151, 148

Total	973,011	34, 523, 974

The details of this table show the extent to which a landed aristo the territory of a country. It appears that twenty-eight dukes own 3,991,811 acres, that thirty-three marquises own 1,567,227 acres, that one hundred and ninety-four earls own 5,862,118 acres, and that two hundred and seventy viscounts own 3,780,009 acres, and that nearly one-half of the inclosed land in England and Wales belongs to a body numbering but 1½ per cent. of all the land-owners.

It further appears that in Scotland, where the total area is 18,946,694 acres, one man owns 1,326,000 acres, another has 431,000 acres, another 427,000 acres, another 306,000 acres, and twelve owners have 4,339,722 acres, about one-fourth of all Scotland. Twenty owners hold more than 120,000 acres each.

In Ireland, where the total area is 20,159,677 acres, one person owns 170,119 acres; twelve persons own 1,297,888 acres; two hundred and ninety-two persons own 6,458,100 acres—nearly one-third of the entire island; one thousand nine hundred and forty-two persons own two-thirds of the whole island.—Financial Reform Almanac for 1885, page

With this exhibit before us can we wonder that there should be a feeling of great unrest among the landless and hopeless tillers of the soil? Can we wonder that the land question is the all-absorbing one in Great Britain? And the question which presses upon our consideration is whether we will learn a lesson from the experience of other nations, and avert, while we can, the evils and the dangers from which others suffer, or will calmly fold our arms and drift on to inevitable disaster.

OUR DANGER AND OUR DUTY.

Although we have successfully and even gloriously rounded the first century of our nation's existence, we must not forget that a hundred years in the life of a government is but as a day when it is past. And we must remember that there are forces more to be dreaded than the tread of hostile legions through the streets of our cities. We may encompass our frontiers with fortifications, our seacoast may bristle with cannon, ironclads may fill our harbors, but it will be all in vain if we permit the sappers and miners within to work on undisturbed. If we would preserve the Republic we must be true to the principles, the precepts, and the practices of its founders.

If we would perpetuate this Government, we must preserve its original simplicity and purity. We must discourage the building up of an aristocracy; especially must we prevent the growth of land monopolies.

We must protect our national domain from the rapacity of foreign capital, and from the influence and power which are thereby secured. We must maintain our broad acres for homes for the free and faithful citizens, and not permit them to be seized upon or despoiled by absentee aliens, giant corporations, or grasping speculators. When our great prairies shall be dotted over with the happy homes of our own people, When our great we shall have secured contentment, prosperity, and peace at home, and respect and safety from abroad; and we can then realize the prophetic benediction of the psalmist:

The pastures are clothed with flocks; the valleys also are covered over with corn; they shout for joy, they also sing.

Aid to Common Schools.

SPEECH

HON. J. W. THROCKMORTON,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 3, 1885.

On the bill (S. 398) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. THROCKMORTON said:

Mr. Speaker: I am not prepared to support the pending measure, whether represented in the Senate or House bills. I concede, as fully as any gentleman on the floor, the importance and necessity of popular education to the perpetuity of republican government.

A people who possess the prerogative of self-government must acquire, by some means, the intelligence which will render the wise and healthy exercise of their sovereignty practicable. To realize that equality of rights which is the essential element in the American idea of republicanism, and to secure to the great masses the material conditions under which the race of life may be evenly run, I am prepared to go further, and advocate not only a universal elementary education that would make the citizens intelligent voters, but that technical instruction that would make them producers, and create a tax-paying, comfortable, and contented community.

I admit the historical fact that the founders of the Government, the

I admit the historical fact that the founders of the Government, the fathers of the Constitution, have not only recognized the importance and necessity of popular instruction, but the obligation of the political communities of the Republic, State and Federal, in their sphere, and for the purpose contemplated in the laws defining these functions to foster and maintain institutions of learning.

Making these general concessions of the needs of the people and the powers and obligations of the General Government, I can not admit that the present measure finds a warrant in the Constitution. Congress has set apart at different times large hodies of the public lands for school has set apart at different times large bodies of the public lands for school nas set apart at different times large bodies of the public lands for school purposes in the several States, and has appropriated the proceeds of the sales of the public lands for the same purpose. This action was legitimate, because it was the simple conversion by the Federal Government, the trustee of the people in the custody and administration of a common property, of lands held for their benefit and then devoted to their uses. This action, however, did not involve the question of taxation of one This action, however, did not involve the question of taxation of one community for the support of the necessitous classes in another. Congress has also appropriated money for the establishment and maintenance of military and naval schools, military and marine hospitals, soldier's homes and asylums. This was legitimate, because it looked to meeting the wants created under legislation of Congress by agencies established by Congress and for the common purposes of defense from foreign and internal foes. In this the General Government was covered by an authorization embraced either in the declaration or just implications of the organic law. There are many acts of beneficence that may be constitutionally enacted by the Federal Government, and there are many that would bring relief to suffering and distress which are not warranted by the law which the Federal Government is under no obligation to do, and which the States should do and can do without vio-lation of law and with greater and more permanently beneficent re-

I am prepared to recognize in all its significance the lesson taught by the statistical exhibits of ignorance presented by the advocates of this measure. This data makes an appeal that no thoughtful, patriotic man can ignore. It demands early and adequate action. There is a duty in this connection which, for its discharge, will demand positive effort by the authorities and concerted action by the citizens.

But I can not admit that the dangers to our institutions from this source are as imminent as the friends of this measure represent it to be; nor can I admit that it is of such a character and such volume as to be beyond the control of the local political communities in which it exists. In my own State, at least, we do not need the kindly interference which this contemplated measure proposes to extend.

The impression from the statistical exhibits is made that not only is the volume of ignorance, especially in the South, enormous and difficult to be handled, but that it is growing rapidly, is a result of permanent causes that inhere in society that are normal and not exceptional, and that it will never be as easily handled as now. I except to the correctness of the conclusion, whether it be found as a declaration or an implication.

The causes contributing this great volume of uneducated people to the voting classes of the South were abnormal and extraordinary—the sudden emancipation and franchisement of millions of uneducated negroes as an incident of the civil war.

groes as an incident of the civil war.

The continuance of this state of things, without prompt correction, was referable to the poverty and destruction of values in that section, incident to the same cause. This section, though not as prosperous nor as rich as other more favored communities, is nevertheless steadily regaining her prosperity, and becoming financially more able to deal with this and other questions that draft upon the revenues of the state.

There will never be a period in which so much ignorance, at so insuspicious a time can be suddenly and may restably introduced into auspicious a time, can be suddenly and unexpectedly introduced into the political life of the country.

The darkest period, in this matter of popular ignorance, has been reached, and later statistics will show that improvement has commenced, and that the light from institutions of learning is everywhere, slowly it may be but steadily nevertheless, driving back the darkness and dispelling the gloom.

Mr. Speaker, apart from the constitutional difficulty that I have stated there are substantive objections that forbid my support of this measure. In my judgment it threatens the integrity of our republican institutions. The highest prerogative of political sovereignty is the right of the community possessing it to determine its own political relations at pleasure and upon its own judgment. At one period of our history this conception of sovereignty was the centralidea in a powerful political school, which taught the doctrine that the Union was framed by sovereign communities, and that this prerogative of sovereignty still inhered in them, and could, when in their judgment necessary, be exercised. This theory of our governmental system has been abandoned. The popular judgment now concedes that the Union is indissoluble under the law, and if formed by sovereign States, this prerogative was exhausted and surrendered by the States when they ratified the organic

The people, through the forms of law, have fixed and determined the relations, jurisdictions, and powers of the National and State Governments; and the same Constitution that recognizes the paramount authority of the General Government within the sphere outlined in that instrument, also recognizes the status and prerogative of the community of States in the limits in which their authority is exercised. I believe that the preservation of these separate but harmonious jurisdictions is to be desired, not simply for economic purposes and for convenience in administering government over an extended area and a dense population, but those higher considerations—the protection of life and property, the preservation of order, the promotion of the prosperity and public content that underlie good government, and the preservation of the liberties of the people—all combine to demand that the integrity of our republican system as it substantially came from the hands of the fathers should be preserved.

This measure is not advocated on the ground that it is a charity to the States whose people would more immediately secure the benefits thereof. It does not proffer alms, but it proceeds upon the supposition that the National Government is performing a duty and is exercising the right that is implied in the existence of such an obligation. I do not admit that any such obligation on the part of the General Government or that any prerogative which is to be exercised to meet this obligation inheres in that Government. Texas has no moral or legal claim on the tax-paying people of Massachusetts by which the national authority could transfer the educational burdens of the first State upon the people of the latter.

This is not an obstructive nor technical vice, but a material and substantive defect in the contemplated legislation; and if such measures be initiated under the plea of exceptional need in certain States it will shock and damage our political system, and the derangement will be all the more dangerous because insidious, and not such as to arrest the attention of the superficial observer.

A further objection is that this movement tends to create out of the national authorities a great parental government, in which the people will become minors and seek the supervision of the national guardian-ship not only in their relations as citizens of the United States, but in their local domestic concerns, and a spirit of dependence will be bred foreign to the manliness that constitutes the strong element that marks the character of a free people. This parental relation is becoming in monarchical institutions, but is antagonistic to republican ideas. It suits a subject, but does not become a citizen. The government belongs to the people, it is their servant and creature, and not their master. The people demand honesty in the administration of affairs and justice in the execution of the laws, but they do not want charities and will secure no favors from their public servants.

There is another view worthy of consideration. In the economy of nature there is no great success that does not demand as its necessary constituents the efforts and contributions of the parties who propose to enjoy this success. Superimposed greatness is of little worth, and that is to be sought and prized which is mainly achieved by the man who wears the laurel. We do oft, as Schiller suggests, "seek the help in others that is in ourselves," but greatness and comforts by individuals and communities can never be achieved in this way. Sacrifice, inconvenience, self-denial, painful exertion are not pleasant things, and human nature, except where necessity compels, does not voluntarily impose these burdens upon itself.

The relief sought in these measures is to be found among the records.

The relief sought in these measures is to be found among the people who live in the presence of these great educational needs; who witness and feel the evils of ignorance, its incompetency, its helplessness, its vices, and its woe

Not accumulation but development is needed. Not aid from without, but the latent, sleeping energies from within must be awakened and organized before a permanent, healthy cure of popular ignorance can be effected. It will never be safe, sir, nor wise to do by proxy and substitute the important things of life that we are competent to do ourselves. The tenderest mother never developed her lusty boy into the strong man by bearing him in her arms through his youth lest he should strong man by bearing him in her arms through his youth lest he should stumble and fall and bruise his limbs. The blunders and falls of the child are the necessary conditions of the steady step and graceful movements of the youth and man.

If this measure becomes a law it may give temporary relief in some instances; it may put more children in the schools for a few years, and give a feverish, spasmodic energy to the cause of education, but it will breed an enervation that springs from the inactivity that outside help frequently produces, that will inconvenience the independence of the communities accepting it, destroy the self-reliance of the people, and in the end, I fear, put out of the schools more children than it puts in so soon as the helping hand of the General Government is withdrawn.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, this in my judgment will be a most dangerous The advocates of the measure allege the conditions that make this legislation necessary are exceptional, and that it is intended to be provisional in its character—limited in its operations by its own provisions, and that it is to recur in law subsequently only in the gravest emergencies.

Not questioning the sincerity of the declaration of gentlemen in this connection, I look with apprehension upon this, as I believe, innovation upon our traditions and institutions.

Think of an ignorance generally bred of indolence, and inspiring in-

Think of an ignorance generally bred of indolence, and inspiring indolence in those who suffer from it, so great that fifty, seventy, or a hundred million of dollars are taken from the common fund contributed by the tax-payers of the whole country, and diverted to educational purposes in certain States through a period of ten years!

With such wild legislation, increasing the national appropriations by millions annually for the next ten years, when are the burdens of taxation, already so oppressive, to be lifted from the backs of the people? I ask you, sir, and I ask the members of this body, with increasing appropriations, already aggregating more than a million of dollars, for the education of a few thousand Indian youths, to supply the inordinate and growing demands of politicians for pensions, the pressing persistence for untold millions to clean out and improve unimprovable creeks, bayous, inlets, and insignificant water courses—how long will it be that you will have a surplus in your Treasury, and how long before your public debt will be discharged?

With this kind of legislation, instead of abolishing your internal taxes and placing articles of necessity on the free-list and reducing others

With this kind of legislation, instead of abolishing your internal taxes and placing articles of necessity on the free-list and reducing others now far too heavy to be borne with patience, you will have to devise new methods of taxation and new articles upon which to impose them. Let this gigantic measure of a parental government become a law for ten years, my word for it, it will become a fixture never to be eradicated unless some great calamity befalls us and reduces our people to great financial distress. With it will grow up new offices, new political machinery will be constructed, new dependencies be created and new habits formed, new and additional taxes levied, and insensibly and necessarily a conflict will originate between the Federal and State jurisdictions, with all the probabilities that the national, the stronger of the authorities. will prevail, and by sufferance for a while exercise local dictions, with all the probabilities that the national, the stronger of the authorities, will prevail, and by sufferance for a while exercise local functions and end by absorbing permanently the powers that sacredly belong to the States. You will witness first these complications, and finally a consolidated centralism that will destroy the simplicity and integrity of our system; the creation by new and increased processes of taxation of revenue surpluses that will breed corruption, and supply the occasion for disturbing and irritating intermeddling by the Federal authorities with the domestic administrations of the States.

I yield to no gentleman in my deep conviction on the subject of non-

I yield to no gentleman in my deep conviction on the subject of popular education, but I differ radically from them in my ideas of the best methods of accomplishing success. Except for the general and common purpose indicated in the Constitution for the National Government, remit the question of popular education to the several States, and keep it there sacredly. Let the local communities study and painfully appreciate their educational wants, and then, by taxation or other adequate means conjoined with the individual help of the citizen in his private capacity and aided by philanthropic men outside of the Commonwealths, address themselves to the solution of the question. Relief will not be long delayed, and when it comes it will be permanent, because healthy. No impairment of the simplicity and harmony of our splendid governmental system will be made in order to accomplish this result, and there is no State that can not meanwhile, until such accomplishment, "bear the ills" that it has not heretofore been able to cure

It is urged that this is an opportune time, when there is such a large surplus in the Treasury, to divert these large sums of public moneys to private use

The existence of such a surplus in a time of peace, in the presence of great commercial distress from heavy taxation and industrial revulsions, is an outrage upon the people, and constitutes a severe reflection upon the wisdom of the party under whose administration and policy such a state of things became possible. Persistent ill-advised legislation has produced this plethoric condition of the Treasury, and presents the question to thoughtful men whether a system of revenue—the so-called protective system—that produces this immense collection of taxes beyond the wants of the Government in order to maintain the integrity of the system, is worth maintenance or deserves the confidence of the American people. This accrument from oppressive revenue laws should be converted to legitimate and needful wants, and not be squanshould be converted to legitimate and needful wants, and not be squandered in projects of doubtful constitutionality, where new drains upon the Treasury will be created necessitating the imposition of increased burdens upon the people to meet them. Increase your Navy; improve your ordnance; make secure the seacoast defenses of your great commercial cities; improve your harbors and great water ways—streams upon which can float the nation's commerce—and not the puny streamlets within the States of no importance whatever; pay the pensioners who have just claims upon the country's gratitude; and if these legitimate demands do not exhaust the surplus so unwisely accumulated, apply the residue to the payment of the public debt, and thus place the Government in position to relieve the people of unjust burdens of taxation, and largely contribute thereby to both stability and progress the material and commercial enterprises of the country.

Rivers and Harbors.

SPEECH

HON. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 14, 1885.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes—

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I notice in one of the morning papers a statement which I have repeatedly heard during the progress of this session of Congress, that certain bills now on the House Calendar, in which the people of this country take a deep interest, will never be considered, for the reason that certain distinguished Democrats pronounce them unconstitutional.

It will be remembered that when the pleuro-pneumonia bill was be-fore this House at the last session—the only bill in the interest of the fore this House at the last session—the only bill in the interest of the agriculturists of this country that has been considered by the Forty-eighth Congress—the most important feature of the bill was ruthlessly stricken out—indeed, the efficiency of the bill was destroyed—because the Democratic side of this House held it to be unconstitutional. They denied the constitutionality of any law that gave to the General Government the authority to place in quarantine any State, or any part of a State, in which this terrible disease was found to prevail, and hence this important bill to prevent the spread of contagious diseases among cattle, unanimously reported from the Committee on Agriculture, was rendered almost useless, because it was met with this so-called constitutional objection.

At this hour the nation sits in silence and waits with bated breath to know the result of the bills now pending in this House to provide national aid to facilitate the removal of the cloud of ignorance and national aid to facilitate the removal of the cloud of ignorance and illiteracy which now threatens the life of the Republic. The Committee on Education, of which I am a member, gave, during the first session of this Congress, careful consideration to this great measure. Delegations, petitions, and memorials came from every part of this broad land, importuning and pleading for the passage of a bill providing Government aid for the removal of the mass of ignorance which now stands as a threatening menance to a free government and a free people. A bill was reported and placed on the Calendar early in last session. A similar bill passed the Senate during the last session and now lies on the Speaker's table. And yet up to the closing hours of this last session not a single moment has ever been given to the consideration of this great question in which 55,000,000 of people are deeply interested. Why is this? Why is the poor boon of a few hours' consideration denied a measure of such great importance? The answer is, that from a Democratic standpoint there is no warrant in the Constitution for the appropriation of money from the national Treasury for the education the wards of the Republic.

The ecclesiastical supremacy of the Mormon Church, and the rapid spread of polygamy in Utah and adjoining Territories, is fast becoming a terror to American civilization and a danger to the liberties and purity of our people. The legislation of the last twenty years has signally failed in staying the onward march of this gigantic evil, and polygamy is more strongly intrenched at this hour than ever before. is more strongly intrenched at this hour than ever before. In the judgment of the best people in Utah it will not be long until the Mormon leaders will dictate the elections in all the region between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific Ocean except California and Oregon, covering that fair land with an oligarchy that defies the pulpit, the press, and the legislation of the nation. The Committee on the Territories, of which I am also a member, by a strict party vote, refused to report favorably a bill, recommended repeatedly by President Arthur, creating a legislative commission for the Territory of Utah to take the place of a legislative commission for the Territory of Utah to take the place of a legislative commission for the Territory of Utan to take the place of the present Territorial government, under which Mormonism is constantly growing in wealth and power. This bill is known to have the support of ex-Presidents Grant and Hayes and of all the leading men in the country who have given this subject careful consideration, and yet it is denied consideration, as is also the Senate bill on the same subject, now on the Speaker's table, for the reason that in the judgment of the leading Democratic minds of this House all such legislation is unconstitutional and in conflict with their notions of State rights.

In view of these facts, and in view of the fact that these doctrines of "State rights" and "strict construction" meet us at every step in legislation when we propose to consider any great measure in which the whole country is interested, I have been waiting from session to session and from day to day, during the consideration of this river and harbor bill, to hear from the distinguished constitutional lawyers on the other side of this House in regard to the constitutionality of this bill. During all these long hours of discussion not one word has been uttered in regard to its constitutionality.

Why this marvelous silence? The men who are known on this floor and throughout the country as great constitutional lawyers, have seen proper, for some reason, not to discuss this phase of the bill or even to allude to it. I am anxious to know, and I think the country is anxious to know, where in the Constitution will be found that warrant which satisfies the Democratic mind that a bill like, this appropriating twelve or fifteen millions a year to the improvement of rivers and harbors, is or liteen mallons a year to the improvement of rivers and harbors, is constitutional. What paragraph or section in that great charter contains this authority? In other years the leaders of the Democratic party denied the constitutionality of all such measures. It is true the recent Democratic platform made at Chicago did what no other Democratic platform ever did before, recognized the great Mississippi River as a fit subject for national care and nurture, but we have not since then been informed whether that platform changes the meaning of the Constitution of the United States in the opinion of the Democratic party in other respects; and, if so, what part of the Constitution is to be interpreted as changing the immemorial orthodoxy of the time-honored Democratic party.

The Whig party in its day, and the Republican party since, has always contended for liberal appropriations for rivers and harbors; and to these two political parties we are indebted for the public sentiment that now prevails in this country in favor of increasing the facilities of commerce. Against this view the Democratic party has stood like a wall of fire for more than half a century, insisting that every such measure and every such appropriation was unconstitutional, just as they insisted at the last session that all of our protective tariffs are unconstitional.

For myself I would gladly aid in building up our commerce at home and abroad, on land and on sea, and I would welcome all legitimate methods of cheapening transportation as being directly in the interest of the producer and consumer the world over; but I am opposed to this bill, and will be compelled to vote against it unless it can be so amended as to eliminate from it many of its objectionable features. I voted against the river and harbor bill passed at the last session, not because I was opposed to river and harbor bills, nor because there were not in it many worthy objects of national bounty, but because there were in it, in my judgment, many appropriations not demanded by the necessities of comperce and these was emitted from it was a superior of the second of the sities of commerce, and there were omitted from it many objects more worthy of aid than those sought to be benefited. I did all I could to have that bill amended, as I have been endeavoring to have this bill amended, so that it would be worthy of support.

Before proceeding further, Mr. Chairman, I want to enter my protest against the accusation repeatedly made by the friends of this bill that those who oppose it are acting in the interest of railroads. I am under no obligations to any railroad company, and no railroad company is under any obligations to me. I have not traveled a single mile on a railroad pass since I have been a member of Congress, nor received from any railroad company, for myself or any of my friends, directly or indirectly, any favor or advantage of any kind whatever; consequently my opposition to this measure can not be attributed to this consideration. Besides, I voted for the Reagan bill, a bill that was top-heavy with anti-monopoly, not because I thought it such a measure as the country needed, but because I believed in the right of the General Government to control interstate commerce, and because I believed in the necessity of some legislation to check the rapacity and injustice of railroad domination. I relied on the Senate to so modify it by suitable amendment as to make it such a law as the country needs. And I am therefore unwilling that my opposition to this bill shall be attributed to any such motive.

The Forty-seventh Congress at its first session appropriated for rivers and harbors a little over $18,000,000, and the magnitude of the appropriation created a political ground-swell that drove from public life many of the most eminent men of the country. It was passed over the President's veto, and became a powerful factor in the campaign of that year. The second session passed no river and harbor bill, but quietly turned the rivers and harbors of the country over to the prudent care of the Democratic party, then assuming jurisdiction of appropriations. The first session of this Congress passed a river and harbor bill appropriating, when amended by the Senate, about $15,000,000. The present bill if a mended to the care extent will senate it. ent bill, if amended to the same extent, will appropriate $15,000,000 more, aggregating in two years the enormous sum of $30,000,000, the largest sum ever appropriated by one Congress for this purpose, making the expenditure for rivers and harbors of the Forty-eighth Congress larger by nearly $12,000,000 than the expenditure of the Forty-seventh Congress for the same purpose, and the largest appropriation ever made for this purpose by any Congress. How is this for Democratic economy? How is this for strict construction of the Constitution? And yet this is in keeping with Democratic professions and practices in other directions. If the Republican party were to propose to expend $30,000,000 for rivers and harbors during a single Congress the Democratic press would stir the country from one end to the other, but now it seems to be all right and strictly constitutional, so far as we can infer from continued silence.

I would like to understand the circumstances under which it is proosed to pass this bill. It has been charged on this floor, and the figures have been given, that the South is getting twice as much of this money as the North, taking into account not only the population but the com-merce and income taxes of these sections. It was stated when the river and harbor bill was under consideration at the last session that the State of Kentucky, the home of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, received $568,000, while the records show that in the judgment of other Congresses Kentucky had only received in the aggregate $457,000 since the State has been in existence. The complaint is also made that this bill gives to Alabama $545,000, while it gives to Pennsylvania only $70,000, a State that pays into the United States Treasury seventeen times as much as Alabama, and is needing improvements of this kind much more than Alabama.

But I do not propose to discuss these questions.

But I do not propose to discuss these questions. I want to call the attention of this committee to some other things which I regard of more importance. It does not seem to be understood that a river and harbor bill, as prepared in this Congress, is more for the political aggrandizement of the members of Congress in whose districts these apgrandizement of the members of Congress in whose districts these appropriations are expended than for the good of commerce. Do not deceive yourselves with the idea that these appropriations have ever been recommended by any authority having any knowledge whatever of their merits. In the Book of Estimates you will find the names of three hundred and sixty rivers and harbors, and opposite each you will see the sum that the Chief of Engineers says can be "profitably expended" in the next fiscal year, aggregating the sum of $34,000,000. We have been informed by the committee that they aimed to appropriate 25 per cent. of the estimates on the rivers and harbors they selected from this list and incorporated into this bill. The fact that these rivers and harlist and incorporated into this bill. The fact that these rivers and har-bors are found in the annual reports of the engineers, and in the Book of Estimates furnished by the War Department to each session of Congress, has given out the impression that these appropriations have the sanction and recommendation of the Secretary of War, based on the estimates and recommendations of the United States engineers. I do not want any member of this House to vote for this bill under this impression, an impression which seems to be a fair inference from many of the remarks and explanations made on this floor.

That there may be no doubt in regard to this matter, I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read a letter from the Secretary of War on this point, received within the past few days:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, February 2, 1885. WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, February 2, 1885.

SIR: In reply to your letter of to-day, I have to advise you that my official estimate for the construction, completion, repair, preservation, and survey of harbors and rivers, to be expended upon such works as may be directed by Congress, amounts to $8,000,000, as will be seen by reference to page 164 of the Book of Estimates. This estimate, as do all other estimates submitted by the Secretary of War, implies a recommendation for an appropriation of that amount for the public service. No recommendation whatever of the Secretary of War is contained or intended to be implied in the detailed statement beginning on page 164 of the Book of Estimates and ending on page 169, that statement being, as is therein stated, a convenient summary of items taken from the annual report of the Chief of Engineers, in which report he is required by law to state the amount that can be "profitably expended" in the next fiscal year on each of the uncompleted works mentioned. It is not myunderstanding that in making a report of the amount that can be "profitably expended" any recommendation for the expenditure is intended; but it is assumed that appropriations having been made, the work is approved by Congress, and the signification is that the sum named in each case can be "profitably expended" so far merely as the prosecution of the work is concerned, without regard to the public importance of the same. By reference to page 66 of the annual report of the Chief of Engineers for the year 1884, you will find a full statement of the basis of his report as regards river and harbor improvements.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN, Secretary of War.

Hon. J. D. TAYLOR, M. C., Washington, D. C.

From this letter it will be seen that the Secretary of War recommends an appropriation of $8,000,000 for rivers and harbors, in a separate estimate, without undertaking to designate a single river or harbor on which any part of this sum shall be expended, leaving this to bor on which any part of this sum shall be expended, leaving this to be done by Congress. He recommends this sum and no more, and yet this bill contains more than $4,000,000 more than his recommendation. Further along in the letter the Secretary expressly disclaims any recommendation, express or implied, for the statement beginning on page 164 of the Book of Estimates and ending on page 169, where will be found the three hundred and sixty rivers and harbors to which I have before referred. He says that this summary of items is taken from the annual report of the Chief of Engineers, not for the purpose of approval or disapproval, but for the purpose of stating the amount that could be "profitably expended" in the next fiscal year, as required by law. And he says that by the use of the words "profitably expended" no recommendation whatever is intended; that it is assumed by the officers recommendation whatever is intended; that it is assumed by the officers of the Government that in cases where appropriations have once been made Congress has approved the work and assumed all responsibility as to its advisability. The only inquiry made by the engineers is how many men can be employed to advantage on the work, and how rapidly can it be profitably prosecuted, without any regard to the "public importance" or "commercial value" of the work when completed.

In further proof of this, I will call the attention of the committee to the following paragraph on page 67 of the lest report of the Chief of the following paragraph on page 67 of the last report of the Chief of

It is proper to state that these annual estimates are made in compliance with the above-quoted requirements of law, and are not to be considered as carrying with them a recommendation of the officer in charge of the district or of this office, either in respect to the commercial value of the improvement or to the amount to be appropriated, other than for the most economical administration of works the prosecution of which had already been approved by Congress.

This shows conclusively what is meant by the words "profitably expended," and it shows that many of these rivers and harbors found their way into appropriation bills by the personal effort of members of their way into appropriation bills by the personal effort of members of Congress who were personally interested in the appropriations; and under the law, when an appropriation was once made, whether large or small, wisely or unwisely, thereafter these rivers and harbors thus preferred maintained their place in the Engineer's reports and in the Book of Estimates, and seem to have some sort of indorsement, when as a matter of fact they have not. Some of these works have been the objects of intimal housing for helps construct them have been the objects of intimal housing the property of the second of jects of national bounty for half a century, though not continuously.

A good idea of the merit of some of the rivers and harbors in this bill can be gained from the result of an examination made under the act of August 2, 1882. This act required the engineer who surveyed the proposed improvements to report whether, in his judgment, the harbor or river was worthy of improvement, and whether the work was a public necessity. This provision only applied to the rivers and harbors of which new surveys had been ordered, and of the one hundred and forty-seven new surveys then ordered only seventy-six were reported worthy of improvement. Apply this ratio to the three hundred and sixty rivers and harbors in the Book of Estimates, placed there in have some idea of the unworthy appropriations which have, in the very nature of things, crept into this bill, saying nothing about the ponds, mill-dams, and trout streams that are unknown to any atlas or map mill-dams, and trout streams that are unknown to any atlas or map ever published in this or any other country.

The remedy which I would propose would be to abolish the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and also the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River—committees that can only accomplish the depletion of the Treasury and the waste of the public money—and appoint a river and harbor board, composed of skilled engineers, whose duty it shall be to survey and examine the rivers and harbors of the United States, and report annually to Congress, through the Secretary of War, what rivers and harbors should be improved in the interest of commerce, how much it would cost, and how it should be done. We have no more use for these two committees than we have the interest of commerce, now much it would cost, and how it should be done. We have no more use for these two committees than we have for a committee on towpaths and turnpikes. Let the Commerce Committee take the report of this board and prepare a bill on rivers and harbors. The men who would compose this board could make a personal examination and survey of the rivers and harbors, and would be free from local interests and local bias.

The angular expect of such a board would command the respect and

The annual report of such a board would command the respect and confidence of Congress and the country, and would be a great improve-ment over the present plan, in which the facts come largely from inter-ested members, and are laid before the House, which can not know, for it has no means of knowing, whether the appropriations are wise or unwise

The length of time occupied in the consideration of this bill, the bitter denunciation of the River and Harbor Committee, the disgraceful wrangling witnessed on this floor during its progress, and the general want of confidence in the bill itself, show that there is something radically wrong.

There is danger that a river and harbor bill will soon be stigmatized as a national scandal. The prospect of this bill becoming a law is diminished by the circumstances under which it was prepared.

The fact that the committee sat with closed doors, not permitting any member of Congress to appear before it; the fact that some members of Congress obtained the ear of a sufficient number of the committee, outside the committee-room, to get their schemes incorporated into the bill, while others did not; the fact that the States represented on the committee were accorded larger appropriations than some States not represented on the committee, all corroborate the point I make, that the plan under which a river and harbor bill is now prepared is all wrong. These complaints are not the fault of the committee; they are the fault of the method that now prevails; and it is the method, and not the committee that about the committee.

tee, that should be condemned.

The community of interest created by putting so many objects of appropriation in one bill is not good legislation. It was repeatedly stated on this floor at the last session, as an excuse for filibustering to defeat the appropriations to construct Government buildings, that there was an implied conspiracy among the forty or fifty members who had bills of this kind then pending to help each other, because they were all supposed to have a common interest in that kind of legislation. Some of the most meritorious bills were denied consideration for this reason alone. I do not admit the justice of this claim, but if there was any ground for such an accusation, how much more objectionable is this river and harbor bill, which contains two hundred and sixtyeight distinct and separate appropriations. It is openly admitted that this has to be done in order to secure the passage of the bill. It is a common joke that the slices of pork must be generally distributed in order to get votes enough to pass the bill. Is this commendable legislation? There are probably a hundred rivers and harbors in this bill lation? There are probably a hundred rivers and harbors in this bill that ought to be stricken out, for which no appropriation ought to be made, but they are left there in order to make friends for the bill, appropriations which would never be made if each appropriation were required to be in a separate bill, and pass the House on its own merits. Think of a bill like this, covering fifty pages, embracing two hundred and sixty-eight rivers, harbors, creeks, and ponds, scattered from one end of the land to the other, to each of which is apportioned a certain sum of money. In all the ages of the world no such bill was ever heard of before. No nation on the earth ever passed such a bill. Think of the piecemeal way of doing business contemplated in this bill. Think of carrying on at the same time two hundred and sixty-eight different of carrying on at the same time two hundred and sixty-eight different public works, and only appropriating from year to year money enough to satisfy the hungry cormorants for whose benefit these appropriations seem largely to be made. Why not select, as other countries do, a few important improvements, and complete them as speedily as possible, and not have them dragging along through one or two generations, unfinished and incapable of use or benefit. If any work is of national finished and incapable of use or benefit. If any work is of national importance, and is needed to open up new and cheaper lines of transportation, it is needed now, and should be completed as soon as possible. This manner of making appropriations is unbusiness-like and fearfully expensive. Fully one-half of the appropriations now made to rivers and harbors is wasted. This seems like a startling statement, but unfortunately it is too true, and a large share of this loss is attributable to the fact that the work is allowed to progress so slowly, to be exposed to floods and storms, delays and hindrances.

to floods and storms, delays and hindrances.

The people of this country want to know what advantages are to be derived from great public improvements; in what way their construction will benefit commerce, and to what extent trade will be facilitated and transportation cheapened. When this is known, the Government can act intelligently, and it should act speedily. De Witt Clinton built the Eric Canal, running from Lake Eric through the forests of New York to the tide water a distance of three handred and sixty. New York to the tide water, a distance of three hundred and sixty miles, in about eight years, and at a cost of $7,000,000. M. De Lesseps built the Suez Canal, with its two harbors, connecting the Red and Mediterranean Seas, shortening the distance 3,700 miles, in eleven years. The Mt. Cenis Tunnel, through the Alps, eight miles in length, was built in thirteen years. The St. Gothard, another tunnel through the Alps, with the Alps, nine and one-quarter miles in length, was built in eight years. It would be well for us to pursue a similar course: first ascertain what improvements would be of the greatest benefit, and then complete them as speedily as possible, instead of distributing appropriations among two or three hundred rivers and harbors without regard to and making the appropriations so small that none of them are completed.

Take for illustration the ice-harbor at Marietta, Ohio, at the mouth of the Muskingum River. In his first report the Engineer strongly urged the importance and economy of making an appropriation large enough to complete the work, but instead of this the miserable practice of doling out homeopathic appropriations has prevailed, and a small ice-harbor, supposed to cost a little over $200,000, begun in 1879, greatly needed then as now, is still incomplete and incapable of being used. The Engineer, in his report made two years since, asked for an appropriation of $66,400 to complete the work, stating in his report that the cost of such improvements is greatly increased by being permitted to drag along during many seasons; and yet the present River and Harbor Comanity seasons; and yet the present river and riarbot committee only appropriated last year $30,000, and this year, when the Engineer asks for $51,400, the committee only appropriates $15,000, perhaps depending on the Senate to increase this sum, as it increased the appropriation last year, to $50,000. The result is that the floods and delays will make this work cost the Government thirty or forty thousand dollars more than it would have cost had the work been completed as speedily as possible, besides losing the use of the ice-harbor for five or six years.

This bill contains an appropriation for Sandy Bay Harbor, supposed by some engineers to cost over $10,000,000, and yet this bill only appropriates to this work $100,000. At this rate it would take a whole century to complete the harbor. If the necessities of commerce demand this improvement, the improvement should be made now, for we do not know what commerce will demand a hundred years hence. If these improvements are demanded by the increase of trade and the rapid growth of population, we should make them at once, if the appropriation should be double or triple what this bill contains. It is not so much whether the appropriations shall be a few thousands of dollars more or less that interests the people, as that there shall be a wise expenditure of the money thus appropriated and an adequate return for

There is one class of improvements which seems to be entirely over-looked in this bill. No appropriation is made for the purpose of having an investigation of the causes and remedies of the destructive floods on the Ohio River, which are increasing from year to year. Is there no remedy? Are science and skill and engineering inadequate to avert this great annual calamity? A remedy was recommended many years since by an eminent United States engineer; and he proposed the same since by an eminent United States engineer; and he proposed the same remedy which this bill proposes to apply to the Upper Mississippi—the construction of great reservoirs, which would hold back the water in times of flood and furnish it to the rivers for purposes of commerce in times of drought. You are proposing to expend millions of dollars in experimenting along the banks of the Mississippi River at its mouth and at Galveston. Why not spend some part of this sum in experimenting on the Obic Rivers? menting on the Ohio River?

One thing should be known and settled before we pass upon this bill; and that is, what is to be the policy of the Government in regard to these appropriations. If we are simply making a divide of the money, it should be determined on what basis the division is to be made. If the number of rivers is to be considered, Ohio must not be forgotten. We have the Miami and Maumee on the west, the beautiful Lake Erie on the north, the turbulent and treacherous Ohio on the south and east, and the Scioto and Muskingum across the interior, the latter being kept navigable the year through at the expense of the State. If the money is to be divided equally, or as nearly so as possible, among members of Congress, there are many members who are not receiving their quota. There seems to be a want of system and a want of a proper understanding in regard to these appropriations, and it is impossible to get the facts. One member says one thing and another says the contrary, one member of the committee makes one statement and another member makes another and a different statement, and we are left to grope our way through all this wrangle and confusion without any means of coming to an intelligent conclusion; and hence the suggestion that there should be constituted a river and harbor board composed, as I think, of three United States engineers, three civil engineers, and one from the Coast Survey; and I would be content if they were all United States engineers, in which event the appointment of this board would add nothing to the expenses of the Government. I have no sympathy with the assault which this bill makes on the United States engineers, nor do I believe that they constitute an "incubus of mediocrity," as has been charged in this discussion. The engineers of the United States on all the public works and on the coast surveys have shown themselves the peers of any civil engineers in this or any other country. Give them as much money and they will do as good work. Do not expect them to construct a work with $1,000,000 for which you would appropriate to a civil engineer a million and a half or two million dol-

I shall not attempt to discuss in detail the various appropriations contained in this bill. Among the many schemes to squander the public money which it proposes the most startling and gigantic are the Sandy Bay Harbor, the Galveston Harbor, and the levee system of the Mississippi River; three schemes which will cost the Government, if ever completed, not less than $200,000,000; and it is very doubtful whether commerce or transportation would be benefited in the least. The numerous small improvements which possess no commercial value whatever are only less objectionable because they cost less money. And the consideration of the river and harbor bill of the last session, as well as this, discloses the fact that it is possible to strike out of the bill a proposed improvement in the North, but impossible to strike out a like objectionable one that happens to be in the South. The Southern members are uniformly more united on anything they undertake than the Northern members are.

No fact is better established than the statement, which has been re-peatedly made on this floor, that the levees for which millions of dol-lars are being appropriated on the Mississippi River, the end of which no man can divine, are intended to benefit the land-owners along the river more than the commerce. And when this great river bursts through its levees, as it most certainly will—for it is often fifty miles wide and entirely beyond the control of human skill—the Government will be called upon to pay the damages resulting, as will be claimed, from broken levees. In my judgment the appropriations contained in this bill for the Mississippi River ought to be reduced at least one-half and applied only to the improvements now in progress.

Mr. Chairman, the House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I embrace the only opportunity I shall probably have to call attention to what I consider a shameless and tyrannical usurpation of power. This river and harbor bill has the right of way, and is given preference and priority over a score and more of bills a hundred-fold more important. It has occupied a great deal of time already, and will occupy much more time before it is completed, while it is impossible under the iron-clad rules of this House, which give the control of all legislation to a few individuals, to give any time what-ever to other bills of more importance. Why should one bill be given weeks of time while others are not allowed a single moment? This is not all. This bill will pass if there is one more vote for it than there is against it, a preference which is not granted to other more deserving measures. I do not complain because this bill can be carried by a majority vote; I only complain because this rule is denied to other more meritorious bills. Let me call the attention of the committee to the record this House has made under the obnoxious and anti-republican rules which had their origin in a purpose to defeat and not to facilitate legislation.

This House has been importuned to restore the duty on wool by re-enacting the law of 1867, an assurance given by the Democratic party of Ohio. State Legislatures have sent in their memorials and the shelves of the committee room are crowded with petitions asking for the restoration of this law. Delegates from all parts of the country came here in person and presented the most convincing arguments. And yet the only time during the Forty-eighth Congress given to the consideration of this question, involving the prosperity of this great industry and the welfare of millions of people, was thirty minutes; and the only vote allowed was at a time when the bill could not pass unless it received two-thirds of the votes of the members. A river and harbor bill can pass by a majority vote under the present rules of this House, while a bill for which farmers plead can not become a law unless it receives a two-thirds vote, and in two years it never had but one opportunity to come before the House

The Mexican pension bill as amended by the Senate, increasing the pensions of widows from $8 to $12 a month, dispensing with proof of prior soundness, substituting the widow for the deceased pensioner without further proof, relieving dependent parents who gave their only boy to their country, recognizing the wants of disabled soldiers who have no means of support, and providing for the blind, idiotic, and imbecile no means of support, and providing for the blind, idiotic, and imbecile children of dead soldiers, though first on the Calendar, has only been given thirty minutes of time in which to be considered during this session, and the vote was taken when the bill could only be carried by a two-thirds vote. The river and harbor bill, which will probably appropriate $15,000,000 to rivers and harbors, is allowed all the time it wants and can be passed by a majority of one vote, while the Mexican pension bill that proposes to appropriate four or four and one-half millions to Mexican soldiers and twelve or twelve and one-half millions to Union soldiers can only be allowed thirty minutes during the whole session, and is rejected, when it has a large majority of the members of this House in its favor, because it has not two-thirds. The money proposed in the river and harbor bill would pension 250,000 soldiers and would gladden the hearts of a million people, including wives and children. The passage of the Mexican pension bill, which only provides pensions for needy soldiers, their widows and orphans, would give an impetus to trade and activity to business in all parts of the country where this money would find its way. The Government pays out annually in its various appropriations about $300,000,000, and yet the only Government money that reaches the country districts is the money appropriated to pay pensions, and this benefits the farmer, the mechanic, the grocer, the merchant, the business man, the laborer, and the entire community, almost as much as it does the pensioner, and yet it is im-possible to secure the consideration of this bill.

Since the right of petition was first declared by "our fathers" to be a sacred and inalienable right, no Congress was ever so importuned by petitions as this Congress has been to pass this bill, and yet the voice of the people has been powerless to reach the party now in control of this House.

It has been shown on this floor by two votes that a majority of this House is in favor of the bankruptcy bill, and its friends believe that its passage would revive trade and improve business, and yet it can not pass and probably will not pass because there are not two-thirds in favor of it. It can only obtain thirty minutes' consideration and obtain a vote under a suspension of the rules when two-thirds are required to pass the bill. This is not true of the river and harbor bill.

The business interests of the country are suffering because of the constant contraction of the currency which is now going on, and yet while the river and harbor bill can occupy weeks of the time of this while the river and harbor bill can occupy weeks of the time of this House, it is impossible for the Committee on Banking and Currency to secure any legislation whatever. The Senate bill to relieve the country in this respect passed the Senate at the last session and lies on the Speaker's table unable to get a moment's consideration, although it was introduced by Senator McPherson, a distinguished Democrat, and has the support of many Democrats in both Houses.

I have already named the Utah bill and the education bill, and I could name many other bills of like importance which have passed the Senate and are denied consideration in the House, the consequences of which must be borne by an indignant and suffering country. It will senate and are defined consideration in the House, the consequences of which must be borne by an indignant and suffering country. It will pass into history that the House is so organized as to defeat legislation; its rules are a stigma upon the nation, its legislation a disappointment to the people. The proceedings of the House are so manipulated as to pass certain favorite schemes and defeat certain important measures, pass certain favorite schemes and defeat certain important measures, without placing before the country just how or by what strategy this is accomplished; but the rules are fearfully and wonderfully made, and the domination of the ruling Democracy is complete.

Mr. Chairman, I want to impress the fact that this is a Republic, and that a majority should rule. The vote of the House should be taken, after reasonable debate, on all these important bills, and if a majority of the members of the House are in favor of a bill, and are willing to so record their votes, the bill should be allowed to pass. Let the party in power take the responsibility of legislation, and let all of these bills have a fair hearing and a fair vote. If we could take up twenty of these bills, give to each two hours' consideration, and then take a yea-and-nay vote, we would pass or reject all of them during the remainder of the session, and merit the gratitude and respect of the country.

Settlers and Purchasers of Lands in Kansas and Nebraska.

They are not mendicants, for when the hell-blasts of the drouth and the clouds of locust a few years ago reduced them to starvation they made no sign, asked no aid of the Government, as did those who saw their all devoured by the flames in Michigan or swept away by the floods of the Ohio or the Mississippi. They fought their battle alone, and what they ask now they ask not as alms but as justice, and to that answering justice in your consciences I committheir case, only regretting that my condition physically perhaps unfits me to represent them on this floor as they deserve to be represented.

SPEECH

HON. JAMES LAIRD. OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 19, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 1737) for the relief of certain settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas,

Mr. LAIRD said:

Mr. LAIRD said:
Mr. SPEAKER: The wrong complained of is this: Between the 25th of March, 1870, and the 13th of April of the same year, some three hundred settlers, with their families, located 50,000 acres of the public domain in Nebraska and Kansas. This was taken almost entirely by homestead and pre-emption entries. The settlers complied with the law and obtained patents of the United States for their lands, which patents they hold to-day. They have been in peaceable possession under their entries and patents for fourteen years with the acquiescence of all the world. By their improvements they have increased the land in value from $2.50, the original cost, to $25 and $50 per acre.

The present value of their lands represents the toil of the working years of their lives. In 1880, in the circuit court of the United States for Nebraska, one hundred and sixteen of these settlers were subjected to a judgment of ouster from possession at the suit of five grantees of the Saint Joseph and Western Railroad, successor to the Kansas Northern Railroad and Telegraph Company, to which Congress, on the 23d the Saint Joseph and Western Railroad, successor to the Kansas Northern Railroad and Telegraph Company, to which Congress, on the 23d of July, 1866, granted ten miles of land, alternate sections, on either side of their road "when definitely located." (14 Statutes at Large, 210.) This judgment was afterward, October 12, 1882, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States (see Van Wyck vs. Knevals, 16 Otto, 360). Suits against the balance of the settlers are now pending or have been since decided against them. When was the line of this road "definitely located" was the point in the litigation over these lands. The granting act took effect July 23, 1866.

The railroad did not accept the grant or do anything looking thereto until the 25th of March. 1870, when they filed in the Department of

until the 25th of March, 1870, when they filed in the Department of the Interior, with the Secretary thereof, the map of the definite location of their road, and thereby, as was ten or twelve years afterward decided by the United States Supreme Court, they became immediately entitled to each odd-numbered section of land belonging to the public domain for ten miles on each side of that definitely located line. tween the date of the granting act, July 23, 1866, and the filing of the map of definite location, March 25, 1870, the lands now in question had, of course, been open to settlement like any other portion of the public domain. The act of Congress did not locate the land granted, but left that to be done by the happening of an event entirely within the control of the railroad, that is, the definite location of their road.

On the 13th of April, 1870, the notice of the Secretary of the Interior withdrawing the lands covered by the grant from entry reached the local land office at Beatrice, Nebr., where alone they were subject to entry, and thereafter none were taken. The evidence taken in this case by the Senate committee of the Forty-seventh Congress shows that this withdrawal was the first notice that the settlers had of the existence or entry, and thereafter none were taken. The evidence taken in this case by the Senate committee of the Forty-seventh Congress shows that this withdrawal was the first notice that the settlers had of the existence or locality of the grant. It is to the lands taken between the date of the fliing by the railroad of its map of "definite location," March 25, 1870, and the date of the notice of the withdrawal from market of the lands covered by the grant by the Secretary of the Interior, April 13, 1870, that the bill under consideration applies. The relief, if granted, will go to the three hundred people who, between those dates, in the most absolute good faith, pre-empted, homesteaded, or purchased some 50,000 acres of the lands held forth by the Government for sale and entry as public lands, and who now, under a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, rendered after twelve years of peaceable possession under the authority of the patents of the United States, are told to "pay or go;" and unless this relief is granted, or they be able to "coin their blood," for they can not mortgage their "clouded" estates, the better part of these three hundred settlers, with their families, aggregating 2,000 people, must, by ejectment, become outcasts from homes made sacred by birth and death, driven forth by the power of the Government, whose patent they hold, from the land enriched by the best years of their brave lives and literally "watered with their sweat."

Mr. Speaker, it is difficult for a man having a face-to-face knowledge of the circumstances surrounding the settlers to speak with that temperance that befits the language of judgment when discussing the wrongs—I had near said outrages—perpetrated upon these people, now about to be dragged from their homes after having been harassed and impoverished by years of fruitless litigation, in which they have been driven from court to court in the name of "instice."

The case of Van Wyck vs. Knevals, before referred to, was a test case. Stripped of its legal verbiage, withdrawn from market—withdrawn from the public domain by the order of the Department having exclusive jurisdiction thereof, and which Department was acted upon by the railroad company by the filing of its map of "definite location." Section 4 of the granting act reads as follows:

That as soon as the said company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior maps of its line designating the route thereof, it shall be the duty of said Secretary to withdraw from the market the lands granted by this act in such manner as may be best calculated to effect the purposes of this act and subserve the public interest.

It is obvious from the reading of this section of the granting act that it was the intention of Congress to prevent conflicts of title between the grant and the claims of settlers locating thereon by limiting the moment at which the grant should operate as a conveyance to the time when such lands were withdrawn from market, and as a consequence "to subserve the public interest" by keeping the lands in market until withdrawn by the Secretary of the Interior. The railroad shall designate the subserve the public interest of the Interior. nate the land selected by it by filing the map of its line, then the Secretary of the Interior shall withdraw the lands, and when this is done the grant shall become operative. There was one thing to be done by the railroad company, namely, file its map; then follow two things to be done by the Secretary of the Interior "to effect the purposes of this

First. Withdraw the lands from the "offered" lands of the public domain, and thus make them subject to the grant; and Second. Do this in such a manner as would "subserve—that is, proct—the public interest."

Mr. Speaker, what "interest"—that is, what right—had the public to be (subserved) protected in? They had the right to enter and take by homestead or pre-emption the offered portions of the public domain, and it was that right which Congress intended, and by this section (4) did protect, when it made the withdrawal of the land by the Secretary a coequal condition with the filing of the map by the railroad to the opera-tion of the grant. Any other construction blots out the "public," the tion of the grant. Any other construction blots out the "public," the people, and holds the public domain, as well as private rights, at the gracious mercy of a pitiful association of land-grabbers; makes a great Department of the General Government, erected for the protection of the people and their patrimony, the public lands, a sort of automatic lackey of the will of a wandering "Will-o'-the-wisp" board of directors of a railroad company existing in "prospectus," who, at the time they filched these 50,000 acres of the people's land, had just that title to it, outside of this decision, that the bird of passage that takes its chance flight over Nebraska and Kansas has to the real estate its shadow falls moon.

It may be answered, in defense of this decision, that the construction contended for here would make the grant depend upon an act of the Secretary of the Interior, and that he might not act. The answer is obvious. A public officer is presumed to do his duty, and courts do not commonly found decisions upon a violation of a solemn presumption of law. Again, if the Secretary of the Interior should refuse to perform an official duty, he is a ministerial officer, and the writ of the court will compel him to do it. But if an act of Congress can not be made dependent on the act of a Secretary of the Interior, how much more so on the act of a railroad corporation? There was no land attached to the grant until the corporation selected it. That which it selected was up to the hour of the filing of its map public domain, "offered" land, and subject to entry under the laws of Congress and the regulations of the Interior Department by any qualified person.

How and when did it cease to be Government land? The court says on the moment the railroad filed its map.

Mr. Speaker, what notice had the people of this? None. What notice had the United States local land officers where these lands were subject to entry and were being taken? None; unless the court holds that the settlers and land officers—1,500 miles away—at their peril take judicial notice of the filing, in some pigeon-hole of the Department of the Interior, of a map of a projected possibility of a railroad. Do we hold our rights at the discretion of a railroad company? Are the great Departments of this Government only their proxies? The map was filed on the 25th of March, 1870. Notice of this "deadly" event reached the settlers, in fact, April 13, 1870, through the medium of that Department having the sole jurisdiction of such matters. According to the court, the lands had ceased to be public lands nineteen days before that date nineteen days before any one knew it except the railroad company, for it is more than probable that the Secretary of the Interior did not know of it until immediately before the date of the withdrawal of the lands.

In the large sense in which a court might view a law which dealt with lands which they knew were then being daily and hourly taken up by settlers, and which law was to be strictly construed against the grantee, and which depended on some action of the Secretary of the Interior, and of the Interior Department, might not the "Secretary of the Interior" mean something more than the mere individual man? Were the ends of the law met when the map of the railroad reached his fingers, carried by some petty clerk of a railroad corpora-tion into the pile of stone in the city of Washington called the 'In-terior' building? When the law commanded the filing of the map with that person it designated him officially; and does not the officer mean the office, the Department over which he presides? Did it not mean the system which centers in him, the interests he represents, the lands committed to his care, the rights of men and of things over which he has jurisdiction? The law says:

The Secretary of the Interior shall withdraw from market the lands granted by this act.

The court says this can have no force, for they were withdrawn by the filing of the map by the railroad, so that withdrawing them in the office of the Secretary in Washington, D. C., was withdrawing them in Nebraska, where my constituents were then taking them under the guarantee of the fourth section of the granting act, which commanded the Secretary of the Interior, upon the filing of the map, to protect the people from title-traps and deadfalls by withdrawing them from market, and which section the court refuse to construe as a part of the law, strangling the people's part agreeably to "justice."

From this is it to be argued that hereafter we shall, in dealing with a railroad company, take judicial notice of its acts the same as of the laws of Congress, the solemn decrees of courts, the proclamations of the Chief Executive, and the operations of nature? If this be so let us

Chief Executive, and the operations of nature? If this be so let us henceforth write our titles upon the sand and give our contracts, heretofore too sacred to be intrusted to the memory of man, in keeping to

Mr. Speaker, I am humbly aware of the fact that it can, here or elsewhere, avail little to criticise or condemn the action of a co-ordinate branch of the Government, but the failure of this honorable court to consider or give force to a part of the law (that is, section 4 of the granting act) which, had it been done, would have saved my unfortunate constituents from ruin, has seemed to invite my attention as to an unwarranted invasion of the legislative department, which, as a member of this body, I must here respectfully resent.

In speaking of this decision I have endeavored to come as near the truth as the rules of this House and that "loving kindness" for the feelings of others—which always marks the course of debate in this House—would permit. And this I have done from the same sense of duty with which, had it been my lot to sit in this body at that time, I would have spoken my mind of the "Dred Scott" decision, which remanded one man to slavery, while this condemns hundreds to banishment from homes honestly carried and to the attendant miseries of ment from homes honestly earned, and to the attendant miseries of want and destitution.

Mr. Speaker, is it for this that the pioneer has fought? Is there no voice that pleads his cause who bravely holds his way along the front of civilization, laying deep and strong the foundations of a mighty State? From the toil and strife of these men sprang Kansas and Nebraska, the first anti-slavery States, even as in the olden time sprang the avenging Marius from the "dust and ashes." Thus born into the sisterhood of States, they have bloomed as might two purple flowers rooted in a pool of human blood. We know there is nothing in all the unstoried greatness of this class that of itself alone should speak to the judicial mind, but when laws are passed for their protection it is meet that those who sit upon the softly cushioned seats of advantage should heed those laws in a contest between abstractions (corporations) and such men. The human being is entitled to the benefit of the doubt; by how much more is he entitled to the benefit of the written law!

Mr. Speaker, the history of these cases in the Interior Department is worthy of a moment's notice, as it would seem to illustrate the unhappiness of those who do business with a "department of chance" (Interior) and afterward are so unfortunate as to encounter the overruling providence of that Department which is alone a law unto itself (judicial).

Against certain of the entries made by settlers on lands which would pass to the railroad, if its grant took effect from the date of the filing of its map, March 25, 1870, the railroad company filed contests, putting in issue the question as to when the grant took effect.

The local land office decided that the lands were subject to entry until they were withdrawn by order of the Secretary of the Interior, and that all entries made prior to April 13, 1870, were good. This holding of the local land office was in keeping with the rulings of the Department of the Interior since 1854. In 1872, on appeal, this ruling of the local land office was reversed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and cash entry No. 3097 and homestead entry No. 4039 (test cases) were held for cancellation. This decision was in accordance with the holding of the Secretary of the Interior in the case of Boyd vs. The Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company, decided April 28,1871, wherein it was held that the grant of the corporation took effect from the date of the filing of the map; but in that case notice was brought home to the settlers. On appeal by the settlers from this decision the Secretary of the Interior (September 3, 1872) reversed the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office canceling such entries, and restored the settlers and purchasers to all their rights in respect to the same. At this point, and in the light of the decision reached in these cases by the Depart ment of the Interior, I desire to call the attention of my honorable colleagues to circumstances of great and peculiar hardship to these settlers, springing from the conflicting decisions of the Department and the courts. The appeal to the Interior Department was mutual, and the result was on all hands acquiesced in as final. Had the Department ruled for the railroad company and given it the lands taken between March 25 and April 13, 1870, the settlers could have transferred their entries to even-numbered sections of Government land, which were exempted from the operations of the grant by the express terms thereof, and on compliance with the law have taken a perfect title thereto. There was at this time plenty of land vacant and available, but having in good faith filed on the odd-numbered sections, and the Government having accepted their entries, they were compelled, under the favorable rulings of the Secretary of the Interior, to proceed with and perfect their settlements or lose their homestead and pre-emption rights.

Mr. Speaker, and what was it to lose these rights? To these moneyless pioneers it meant not alone the loss of home, for home it was not; it meant the loss of the hope and possibility of a home. It was their all and the all of their children; it was their past, present, and their future. It was only an inchoate right to eighty or one hundred and sixty acres of the public domain, upon which to wage a hand-to-hand fight with the primordial elements of earth, air, and water, for a bare empted from the operations of the grant by the express terms thereof, fight with the primordial elements of earth, air, and water, for a bare existence! Not much, but it was their all. Is there a man in this House who will join the Government in its mean attempt to rob them

These settlers read the laws of Congress granting homesteads and preemptions to actual settlers; they read the instructions of the Department of the Interior, and they saw that they were within these. They read the decision in the contest case here referred to, and they said that is all right; that is in our favor. They read the platform of the great Republican party which promised them the earth if they would vote the straight ticket, and then they read the platform of the great Democratic party which promised them not only the earth, as the other platform did, but everything over it and under it, and they said, "We are safe; our friends the politicians, will take care of us," and they are still strong in that faith; they still hope to "read their titles clear" in the light of your promises; they still believe that Congress—this Congress, gentlemen wants to and will do what is right. And so they come, stripped by legal jugglery of their homes, your "glorious birthright of the free" of the platforms and preambles, and holding forth their empty parchments ask you if you talk to them in two tongues; they demand that you make good in this foul day the fair-weather promise of the laws and the decisions of the great heads of Departments; they ask that we be big enough to do justice to the poor pre-emptor, homesteader, purchaser, farmer, even as to the great railroad corporations; they ask that we be estopped from taking advantage of our own wrong, and profiting by the deceiving advice and decisions of our trusted agents. They ask this, these brave "sons of earth," and with them join the voices of half a million of Union veterans, robbed also of their rights by the "law's Thousands of pioneers and frontiersmen, men in Nebraska, Kansas, and in all the States and Territories west of the Missouri River, whose all was swallowed up in the flames of savage border war, and to whom the nation, by its settled policy, owes redress, join thousands of others, to whom the nation justly owes millions, in asking speedy justice. They ask, and if their most just demands be not answered by fulfillment it will become us all to "look that our walls be strong," for when they shall have roused the "sleeping thunder" of public opinion on the question of their rights, there will come a "change" indeed over the face of things political, and then this penal blindness to their rights will cease. The remedy proposed is that the United States pay these settlers and purchasers what it has or may cost them to buy in the paramount title, in no case exceeding $3.50 per acre, except where court costs have been made, and in such cases to pay such costs in addition to the sum above named, in accordance with the provisions of the following bill, which was favorably reported from the Public Lands Committee of this House Kansas, and in all the States and Territories west of the Missouri River, was favorably reported from the Public Lands Committee of this Hous at the first session of this Congress. This is substantially the same bill which has twice passed the Senate of the United States, first during the Forty-seventh Congress, and again during the first session of this Congress, at which time it passed without a dissenting vote. It is as fol-

A bill for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas,

A bill for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That for the purpose of reimbursing persons, and the grantees, heirs, and devisees of persons, who, under the homestead, preemption, or other laws, settled upon or purchased lands within the grant made by an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas Railroad and Telegraph," approved July 23, 1868, and to whom patents have been issued therefor, but against which persons, or their grantees, heirs, or devisees, decrees have been or may hereafter be rendered by the United States circuit court on account of the priority of said grant made in the act above entitled, the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as shall be required for said purpose, is hereby appropriated: Provided, however. That no part of said sum shall be paid to any one of said parties until he shall have filed with the Secretary of the Interiora copy of the said decree, duly certified, and also a certificate of the judge of said court rendering the same to the effect that such a decree was rendered in a bona fide controversy between a plaintiff showing title under the grant made in said act and a defendant holding the patent or holding by deed under the patentee, and that the decision was in favor of the plaintiff on ground of the priority of the grant made by said act to the filing, settlement, or purchase by the defendant or his grantor; and said claimant shall also file with the said decree and certificate a bill of the costs in such case, duly certified by the clerk and judge of said court. Thereupon it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to adjust the amount due to each defendant on the basis of what he shall have failed as aforesaid, and the costs appearing by the bill thereof. He shall then make a requisition upon the Treasury for t submitted the following report to accompany the foregoing bill:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred bill H. R. 1737, having had the same under consideration, report:

That by act of Congress, approved July 23, 1866, there was granted to the State of Kansas, for the benefit of what is now known as the Saint Joe and Denver Railroad, each odd-numbered section of land for ten miles on each side of its line, "when definitely fixed."

The railroad company did not accept the land granted, or do anything look." ing thereto, until the 25th of March, 1870, when they filed with the Secretary of the Interior the map of the line of definite location of their road. From the date of the granting act, July 23, 1868, to the performance of the first act of acceptance by the railroad, all the lands within the limits of the prospective grant had been open to settlement at the land offices of the Government, and were taken by settlers and purchasers without reference to the numbers of the sections, the same as any other public land. This state of things continued until April 13, 1870, when the lands within the limits of the grant as shown by the map of the line of definite location were withdrawn from market and from settlement, by order of the Secretary of Interior. It is with the settlers upon, or purchasers of, these lands between the dates named, i. e., March 25, 1870, and April 13, 1870, that the bill under consideration seeks to deal, and the question arises in this way: When did the grant take effect—from the date of the filing of the map of the line of definite location March 25, 1870, or from the date of withdrawal of the land from entry at the local land office April 13, 1870?

The grantees claimed that the law operated as a conveyance from the 25th of March; the settlers and purchasers, that the grant was not operative until the withdrawal, April 13. The facts show that the first knowledge that the settlers or purchasers had that these lands were not properly subject to entry, or were liable to be claimed by this or any other railroad, was that obtained through notice of their withdrawal from settlement at the local land office at Beatrice, Nebr., where they were alone subject to entry. Nor does it seem legally possible that they should know of such fact prior to April 13, the date thereof, for the locus to which the law in question might apply was made to depend upon a fact only within the knowledge of the grantees—namely, the filing of the map of the line of definite location, upon the extention of the grant, relied upon by the purchasers and settlers, was based on section 4 of said act, which is as follows:

"That as soon as the said company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior maps of its line designating the route thereof, it shall be the duty of said Secretary to withdraw from the market the lands granted by this act in such manner as may be best calculated to effect the purpose of this act and subserve the public interest."

Your committee are of the opinion that under such section it was the duty of the Secretary of the Interior for thwith wilhdraw the lands subject to the grant (as fixed by the map) from market, that being the way "best calculated" to effect the purpose of the act, and the only way in which the public interest in the right of sale and entry therein could be secured (subserved) without a damaging interval between the withdrawal of the lands, by operation of law on the filing of the map of location, and their restoration to sale under the grantase contended for by the grantees, and that pending such withdrawal the lands were public lands, as to which the public hade a perfect right of entry and purchase.

Whether according to law or not, this is what

SIE: Senate bill 57, "for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas," was received by your reference of the 7th instant, and referred to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. I have the honor to inclose herewith copy of his report on the subject under date of the 24th instant.

Very respectfully,

Hon. P. B. PLUMB,

Chairman Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

Very respectfully,
Hon. P. B. PLUMB,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

Department of the Interior, General Land Office,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1884.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt by your reference, for report, of a communication from Hon. P. B. Plums, chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, dated the 7th instant, transmitting Senate bill No. 57, entitled "A bill for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas."

In reply I have to state the bill pertains to certain lands within the limits of the grant to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas Railroad and Telegraph, now known as the Saint Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company (14 Statutes, page 210).

The records of this office show that a map of the definite location of the Saint Joseph and Denver City Railroad, as adopted by the board of directors of the company March 21, 1870, was received in this office, with a letter from the then Secretary of the Interior dated the 28th of the same month.

By letter from this office, dated the 8th of April, 1870, the local officers of the several land districts in which the grant was located were directed to withdraw from sale or entry all the odd-numbered sections within the limits of the grant. This order was received at the local offices April 13 and 15, 1870, which dates were formerly held as the times when the right of the company vested to the lands granted.

Under that construction of the granting act entries were allowed to be made for lands within the limits of the grant until said dates, April 13 and 15, 1870.

This appears to have been the established rule of the office, in compliance with the provisions of the act approved March 27, 1874 (Revised Statutes, 2281). (See circular of February 10, 1870, Copp's Land Laws, page 403.)

That rule was subsequently changed by the opinion of Assistant Attorney-General Smith, concurred in by the then Secretary of the I ject.

"This ruling is intended to be prospective in its operation, and not to disturb past transactions. Your decision is therefore reversed."

In compliance therewith this office released that class of entries from suspension.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Van Wyck vs. Knevals, held that the right of the company attached on the day of the acceptance by the Secretary of the Interior of the map of the definite location of the road, which was March 28, 1870 (16 Otto, 360).

Under this decision, if the land was clear of adverse claims at that date, and was entered or purchased from the Government prior to April 15, 1870, the patents issued thereon are invalid.

The pending bill proposes relief for that class of settlers or purchasers whose claims had their inception subsequent to March 28, 1870, in cases where the lands were not excepted from the operation of the grant by prior valid adverse claims. It is apparent from the foregoing that settlers who, under the rulings of the Department, were permitted to initiate claims upon lands within this grant after said date, and subsequently received patents for the same from the Government, which the courts have declared invalid, have strong equities, and I think the proposition for their relief embraced in the bill as good as any that occurs to me and which would be practicable.

I think the bill should pass.

The bill referred by you is herewith returned.

I am, very respectfully,

N. C. McFARLAND, Commissioner.

N. C. McFARLAND, Commissioner.

Hon. H. M. Teller,
Secretary of the Interior.

In such determination of their rights the railroad company acquiesced. The purchasers and settlers complied with the laws, took patent to their lands, and for nearly ten years were left in peaceful possession under a title supposed to be the best in the United States.

It is important at this point, in determining the equities set up by the settlers against the Government, to observe, that had not this litigation as to their title taken place at the time it did the claim now advanced would have been in a great degree weaker than it is.

When their title was challenged by the railroad they promptly appealed to the Land Department authorities of the Government to know whether it was good or not and whether the Government could ultimately give them a perfect tide. If they were ever to lose the land then was the time for them to know it. They had made little or no improvement; there was plenty of land near at hand as good as that taken, and to which they could unquestionably get a good title. To mislead them then was to rob them of all opportunity to regain their loss save as they seek it now.

To their questions as to the legality of their holding, the Government, by its officers, answered, "You are all right; go ahead with your settlements, comply with the law, and you shall have a perfect title." They did so, built homes, reared families, improved their lands, paid taxes, and developed the country, trusting without suspicion to the official acts and decisions of all the officers of the Land Department. And now, when these men, stripped of the fruit of their toil by much and merciless litigation brought upon them by the errors of the Government they trusted, come and ask that they may be defended from ejectmentand exile from their home by the payment to them of the money it has cost them to buy in the title which they have already bought of the United States, your committee submit that the Government is estopped from denying them relief—for to refuse would be for it

Inest by settlers and purchasers to these lands, your committee find that prior to 1879 the Saint Joe and Denver Railroad had passed into the hands of a receiver, and that whatever lands it was entitled to under the grant in question had become the property of Sherman W. Knevals and others by purchase at judicial sale.

On the 3d of July, 1879, Knevals brought suit in the United States circuit court for Nebraska against one Judson R. Hyde, who recently prior thereto had purchased a portion of the land within the limit of the line of the land of the land within the lands of the land of the land of the land within the lands of the land of the land

Under these circumstances the settlers and others were driven to a settlement, which was finally agreed on so far as the Knevals cases went, at the rate of $3.50 per acre and costs. To pay this the settlers and purchasers gave mortages, or raised it as best they might, or lost the land.

As the question may arise as to whether settlement with Knevals could not have been effected for a less amount, it is fair to state to the House that your committee are satisfied from the evidence and circumstances in the case that this settlement was a remarkably reasonable one.

The land had risen in value with the improvements put upon it by the holders and the growth of the country to be worth from $10 to $25 per acre, so that Knevals, taking into account the expense of litigation, was getting little more, if not actually less, than Government price for the land; and again the settlers were paying what they did without any certainty of getting it back. Arrangements for a settlement of the other cases have been made with other grantees of the railroad at from $1 to $2.75 an acre, but in no case under this bill can they receive more than $3.50 per acre and costs where they have been subjected to the same. This guards against extravagant or collusive settlements. And this is the status of the case outside of Congress to-day.

At the present session of this Congress the bill under consideration has passed the Senate without opposition or an opposing vote.

The number of persons so far sued and subjected to adverse judgment is one hundred and ninety-six; the amount of land involved is 25,620 acres.

What additional number of persons are affected, and what further amount of land involved, your committee can not well determine. The amount of money required to make good the cases so far shown in the records of the court will not exceed $100,000, or less than one-half of the appropriation indicated by the bill; and that from all information brought to the attention of the court will not exceed $100,000, or less than one-half of the Mexican peons, whose ejectment under like circumstances we as a people would resont.

The bill as presented only asks relief for such persons, their grantees, heirs, and devisees, as under homestead, pre-emption, or other laws settled upon or purchased lands within the grant in question and to whom patents have been issued therefor, but against which decrees have been or may hereafter be rendered by the United States circuit court on account of the priority of the grant in question to the patents held by such persons, their grantees, et al.

As this requires all cases to be passed upon by the courts and the consequent expense of hitigation to the holder of the patent, and of costs to be paid by the Government, your committee propose to amend the bill by adding after the word "aforesaid," in the last line, the following proviso:

"Provided further, That when any person, his grantees, heirs, assigns, or devisees, shall prove to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that his case is like the case of those described in the preceding portions of the bill, except that he has in good faith paid to the person holding the prior title by the grant herein referred to the sum demanded of him without litigation, that such Secretary shall pay to such person such sum as he has so paid, not exceeding $3.50 per acre, taking his release therefor, as hereinbefore provided."

Amend the bill by adding after the word "of," in line 31, the words "what he shall have paid not exceeding."

And, as so amended, your committee recommend that the bill do pass,

Mr. Speaker, there has been no public discussion of this measure in this House; that in the Senate was entirely friendly. In the commit-tee of the House the principal objection was to the establishment of a precedent of this kind. It was also urged that the act of 1825 fixed the liability of the Government in such cases and afforded all the relief that the settler was entitled to. The act of January 12, 1825 (4 Statutes at Large, 80), provides that in case of the failure of an entry or title the Government shall repay to the claimant what money it has received from him without interest. This would give a man who loses a patent to a homestead on which he had expended fourteen years of labor, and on which he had placed improvements worth thousands of dollars, all of which he has lost through ignorance of the agents of the Government, the magnificent sum of from $14 to $18 of his own money, and no interest even! To a pre-emptor it would return from $100 to $200, or from $200 to $400, according to the acreage of the tract purchased and whether in or out of railroad limits, which would likewise be his own money, and no interest!

The act of 1825 is entirely inadequate to meet this or any other case where an entryman on the public lands loses his land after patent. Nor was this law, in my judgment, ever intended to meet a case of this character or magnitude. It may be well calculated to reach the individual cases that often arise from clerical error, such as duplicate entries and like cases. Where the mistake, being immediately discovered, permits of adequate remedy through this law, the party suffers no great loss in the transfer of the entry, or the restorations of the right and the

The act of 1825, Mr. Speaker, is a law of Congress, not a law to it. It is well enough in its place, but it can no more reach and cover a case of this character and consequence than Congress could have met the demands of humanity from the forest-fires of Michigan or the floods of the Ohio and the Mississippi by referring the homeless, starving victims of those calamities to their several township boards for the care of the poor. And yet Congress granted these people relief to the extent of nearly a million of dollars, and this was done in the name of humanity! Here are three hundred or more settlers, representing with their lity! Here are three hundred or more settlers, representing with their families fifteen hundred or two thousand people, human beings, driven, or about to be unjustly driven, from their homes! Will not this Congress do as much in the name of "justice" as it did in the name of "humanity?" Shall the Congress become a general insurer against the evil consequence of fire and flood and refuse to make good losses sustained entirely through the mistakes of its agents?

tained entirely through the mistakes of its agents?

Gentlemen, I point you to where you have expended hundreds of thousands for a sentiment! Will you refuse the price of their homes to these men, who ask in the name of right? I heard you of the other side say, speaking of the relief to the Ohio and Mississippi sufferers, that you legislated "from the heart!" Are your generous impulses dead, or can they only be aroused through the medium of the senses? Must you see these pioneers drowning like the people in Mississippi, or burning like those in Michigan, before your spirits will rise above the barrier of the law of 1825 and grant them relief? If so, pardon me, but this after death gratitude is more than we sak. If the souls of the but this after-death gratitude is more than we ask. If the souls of the gentlemen on the other side were so touched in the Ohio case by the sight of large quantities of a mysterious element called "water" as that they instantly voted $300,000 to avert the miseries threatened those who were at its mercy, may I not hope that the emotion is not dead, and that the $300,000 expressed for "sentiment's" sake at the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress is equal to a two-hundred-andfifty-thousand-dollar act of justice in the second session of that same Congress.

Mr. Speaker, as to the matter of precedent, that objection is entirely prospective, for I do not understand that this bill is open to the objection that it is against any precedent already established by Congress. On the contrary, as I understand the case, it is supported by an unbroken line of precedents, from the Thirteenth Congress, in 1814, to the case of Myra Clarke Gaines, in the Forty-eighth Congress, 1884-'85, a bill for whose relief, it will be remembered, passed this Congress at its first session. This bill provided that Mrs. Gaines should be paid$1.25 per acre for 38,457 acres of land taken by the Government, and to which she was entitled by descent. The difference between the quantum of recovery in this case and that of Mrs. Gaines is explained by the fact that the land she claimed was wild and unimproved, while the land that the land she claimed was wild and unimproved, while the land claimed by this bill owes its great value to the improvements put upon it during an occupancy of fourteen years by people who took it for a livelihood. The old cases condensed from the "State papers" are as

In 1814 an act was passed granting indemnity to certain claimants of the public lands in the so-called "Mississippi Territory," lying west of Georgia and south of Tennessee (3 Statutes at Large, page 116). This act called for the payment of $5,000,000 to settlers and purchasers, as

To the Upper Mississippi Company.	$350,000
To the Tennessee Company	600,600 1,550,000
To the Georgia Company, or persons claiming under said company	2, 250, 000
To citizen claimants	250,000

.. 5,000,000

These sums were granted upon memorials to Congress, in which the claimants, in one form or another, set up title to lands in said "Territory;" some under patents, &c., from Great Britain, some under patents, &c., from Spain, while others set up title under a sale authorized by a leg-from Spain, white others see up three tinder's eate authorized by a legislative act of Georgia passed in 1795, which latter, because of alleged fraud and corruption, was repealed a few months after its passage.

The United States Supreme Court held in 1810, in Fletcher vs. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87, that all these titles were valid, but they had become so "clouded" as to be practically valueless to the real owners. They might have brought suit, as was done in VanWyck vs. Knevals, to oust the settlers who were on the lands under deeds of quitclaim and release from the United States, but the claims were so numerous and the action of Georgia and the United States had been such as to indicate that both desired to compromise and settle the claims rather than permit the settlers to be ejected by proceedings at law.

The conflict of title arose in this way: Great Britain owned the "Mississippi Territory" prior to 1783, it being ceded that year to Spain, and by Spain to the United States in 1797–'98. Georgia claimed that this territory was secured for her, and not for the common benefit of all the States, as the General Government claimed.

Standing upon her assumed right to this territory, Georgia, by legislative act passed January, 1795, granted some of the lands lying in the said territory to individuals and companies. It was alleged that this act was procured by corruption and fraud, and it was repealed February, 1796, the object of the repeal bill being to cut off the purchasers. As heretofore stated, the United States Supreme Court (6 Cranch) held that the purchasers were bona fide claimants with no notice of alleged fraud, and that their titles, as well as the titles of those settlers thereon natid, and that their titles, as well as the littles of those settlers thereon under patents, &c., from Great Britain and from Spain, were valid.

Prior to this decision the trouble apprehended was so serious in its proportions that as early as April, 1798, Congress passed an act for an amicable adjustment not only of the limits of Georgia, but to establish Mississippi Territory. This act provided for the appointment of three commissioners to meet a like number of commissioners on the part of Georgia to settle all the interfering claims that existed between claimants, Georgia, and the United States. This act also provided that the lands ascertained to belong to the United States in that territory should be sold by the General Government, and by another provision the Mississippi Territory, consisting substantially of the States (now) of Alabama and Mississippi, was established. It also provided that the rights of Georgia (pending the action of the commissioners) and of claimants were not to be impaired.

In 1800 Congress passed a supplemental act authorizing the Commissioners of the United States (and those of Georgia) to take a deed of cession from Georgia of the lands to settle all claims of settlers or claimants, or receive from them terms of compromise. Terms were proposed and the commissioners sent them to Congress.

On the 24th of April, 1802, Georgia passed a cession and compromise act, ceding to the United States her claims to the territory. This act was conditional:

First. That the United States pay Georgia from the proceeds of the sale of lands in that territory the sum of $1,250,000.

Second. All persons who were actual settlers in the aforesaid territory October 27, 1795, should be confirmed in their grants, made by either Great Britain or Spain.

Third. The United States might reserve 5,000,000 acres, or the proceeds thereof, to "satisfy, quiet, and compensate" such claimants other than those who had received grants from Great Britain and Spain. The other, it was understood, were the Georgia claimants, or purchasers under legislative act of 1795.

March 3, 1803, Congress passed an act (2 Statutes at Large, 229) "to dispose of the public lands south of Tennessee," that is, the lands in Mississippi Territory. This act confirmed the old grants made in various ways by Great Britain and by Spain; and by section 8 made provision for setting aside enough of the proceeds of the sales of the lands to "satisfy, quiet, and compensate" such "other" claimants as should appear, evidently meaning the Georgia claimants and other settlers who had entered and cultivated lands in said territory under license or in other manner by authority.

It would appear from memorials presented to the Thirteenth Congress, third session, that the General Government, up to that time (1814), had never indemnified the claimants, as it was clearly intended they should be under Georgia's deed of cession of 1802 and the act of Congress of 1803. The result was the passage of the act of 1814, authorizing the payment of $5,000,000 to the claimants, in order to save them narmless and to make good to the settlers their homes and firesides under the patents or releases issued to them by the General Government under the act of 1803. (Volume 2, American State Papers, Public Lands, pages 740, 743, Duff Green's edition, 1834.)

The second precedent is an act of Congress passed January 14, 1820 (6 Statutes at Large, 236), "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Philip Barbour, deceased."

Philip Barbour's father located 2,000 acres of land in "West Florida" under the following circumstances. The father of Philip had served.

under the following circumstances. The father of Philip had served as a captain in the British army until the war in the American colonies terminated in 1763. In 1768 he settled in the (then) colony of West Florida, now Mississippi, and there located the land mentioned, living thereon up to the Revolution. For espousing the American cause he was seized and his personal property confiscated. When Spain, in 1789, was seized and his personal property confiscated. When Spain, in 1789, obtained this territory from Great Britain, Barbour received Spanish confirmatory grants of his located lands. He lost his papers, and the United States coming into possession of the territory from Spain sold 1,500 acres of the 2,000 located by Barbour. The act passed was to give the son of Barbour relief, so as not to disturb the settlers under grants from the United States of lands which the General Government did not own. (See American State Papers, Public Lands, volume 3, page 345, House Report No. 282, Duff Green's edition.)

The third precedent to support this bill is found in an act passed by Congress May 26, 1824-

An act authorizing the President to ascertain the number of acres of landlying between the Ludlow and Roberts lines of survey in Ohio, the value thereof, exclusive of improvements, held by claimants under Virginia military-land warrants, and on what terms the claimants would release, &c. (4 Statutes at Large, 70.)

Twenty-one hundred acres of land were involved. In 9 Wheaton, 469, the legal question at issue between rival claimants was passed upon and a relief bill followed.

The House Public Lands Committee made a report on this case, in The House Public Lands Committee made a report on this case, in which it appears that the contending parties both claimed under a title derived from the United States, as is the case here. (See American State Papers, Public Lands, volume 3, page 620, House Report 410.)

The plaintiff claimed under a warrant granted to one of the soldiers of the Virginia line; the defendants claimed under a direct purchase from the United States Government and patent. The court, in 9 Wheaton, 469, held that plaintiff was entitled to recover.

The report on the act or bill was:

The report on the act or bill was: First. That the land involved was divided in small farms under a high state of cultivation and of improvement, owned by various individuals in moderate circumstances who are unacquainted with litigation and fearful of being dragged into a court of justice.

Second. That good faith required an exertion on the part of the Government to quiet in their possession persons who had expended their all in purchasing and improving the lands for which they hold the patent of the United States.

Third. The committee did not say what measure of damages should be allowed, but did say that the "most liberal allowance should be extended" toward citizens; that in the Philip Barbour case (supra) the amount or basis of indemnity was the damages equal to the valuation.

In the Eighteenth Congress, second session, this matter again came up, Mr. Rankin making the report from the House Public Lands Committee. (Volume 4, American State Papers, Public Lands, Gales & Seaton's edition, 1859, page 66, House Report No. 441.) This report refers to the report supra (No. 410), and says:

to the report supra (No. 410), and says:

Your committee are unanimously of the opinion that purchasers from the United States who purchased on the faith of the Government, who are understood to have made large improvements on the lands, ought not to be disturbed in their possessions and deprived of the fruits of their industry, provided the adverse claims can be quieted without an unreasonable sacrifice on the part of the Government. To a numerous class of valuable citizens, deprived of their homes after years of tedious and expensive litigation, the purchase-money and interest would be a very inadequate and unsatisfactory remuneration, while the Government, without having any regard to the claim which would be made for the valuable improvements of which citizens would be deprived, would be compelled to pay a much larger sum than that proposed in the compromise with the claimants under the Virginia military land-warrants.

The committee reported a bill suphysicing the President to purchase

The committee reported a bill authorizing the President to purchase the releases of all the settlers claiming title who had located prior to June, 1812, under their military-land warrants, between the Ludlow and Roberts lines.

The amount of money appropriated by the act of 1824 was $80,000, that being what it cost the Government to buy in the paramount title of those holding the Virginia military-land warrants.

The fourth precedent is as follows: In 2 Peters, United States Reports, 417, will be found the case of Reynolds vs. McArthur. The latter brought ejectment and recovered, and this decision was sustained. The facts were as follows: McArthur claimed under a patent of the United States, dated in 1812, founded on an entry and survey made in 1810, on a warrant granted for services in the Revolution. Reynolds claimed as assignee of one Van Meter, who had entered the same land at the Cincinnati land office. The theory of Van Meter's title was that the lands northwest of the Ohio River, between the Scioto and Little Miami, west of Ludlow's and east of Roberts's lines, which had been reserved to satisfy military bounties which Virginia had promised, had been (prior to 1810) withdrawn. The land office acted on that theory, but the court held not, and gave McArthur and all others similarly situated their titles. This called for relief to those who had taken and entered as had Van Meter. Hence we find that Congress passed an act, approved February 12, 1831, giving one Philip Doddridge (see 9 Wheaton, 469) the sum of $1,765.68 for seven hundred acres of land (taken as Van Meter's had been), with interest at 6 per cent. from 1825 (4 Statutes at Large, 440).

It is not my purpose to discuss the old cases; their application is obvious. It is, however, worthy of note that while the act for the relief of the settlers on the lands covered by the Virginia military-land warrants, passed May 26, 1824, is prior to the act of January 12, 1825, nevertheless the committee of the Eighteenth Congress answers the arguments made to-day under the act of 1825 when they say:

Your committee are unanimously of the opinion that purchasers from the United States who purchased on the faith of the Government, who are understood to have made large improvements on the lands, ought not to be disturbed in their possession and deprived of the fruits of their industry, provided the adverse claim can be quieted without an unreasonable sacrifice on the part of the Government. To a numerous class of valuable citizens deprived of their homes after years of tedious and expensive litigation, the purchase-money and interest would be a very inadequate and unsatisfactory remuneration.

Accordingly they report and the Congress passed a bill for the relief of those settlers, under which the United States expended $80,000 in buying in the paramount title to 2,100 acres of land, being at the rate of $38 per acre.

The fourth precedent cited, that of the bill for the relief of Philip Doddridge, demonstrates that the law of 1825 was not regarded by the then Congress as sufficient for the relief of cases like the one under consideration.

In citing precedents favorable to this bill I have not thought it necessary to refer to a numerous class of modern cases with which Congress is brought in contact nearly every time it goes to the Private Calendar. I refer to the bills for the relief of persons who have complied with the law as to settlement on homesteads and pre-emption, paid their fees and money, and yet can get no patent because the land has been previously patented or granted to another, and who, instead of receiving back their fees and money under the law of 1825, or that of 1828 to the same effect, ask Congress to give them another piece of land without settlement or the payment of fees. This Congress has done in hundreds of cases, thus putting afloat thousands of acres of scrip, some of which is very valuable. These settlers do not ask this; they ask what is less in point of value; they ask not for its scrip, but for their homes. The gentlemen who oppose this bill because of the prespective operation of the precedent say that it will let in floods of claimants. Suppose

The gentlemen who oppose this bill because of the prospective operation of the precedent say that it will let in floods of claimants. Suppose it does. If they come with such a case as this Congress ought to welcome the opportunity to do them justice. But that this will result is refuted by the record. Seventy-one years have passed since, when, in 1814, the United States paid $5,000,000 to quiet title to lands, and in that time only three cases, excluding that of 1814, have been acted upon. Not an overwhelmingflood, gentlemen! Only four cases, so far as I can discover, of direct money relief to settlers for the loss of title since the formation of the present Union—four cases in what is practically one hundred years. Four cases in the course of the settlement of a continent, one case to about every 15,000,000 of people, and gentlemen speak of a flood to spring from under this precedent. Where will it spring from—from the lands of the future? Where are they? We have the great Territories, mostly deserts, worthless unless irrigated; the mountains whose grim surfaces are valueless to all husbandmen unless they come to behold that which was written in the wrath of creation, the tragedy of material nature, and to gather the inspiration of that majesty which is beyond speech—the ice-fields of Alaska. There are other millions of acres that were flung into the insatiate may of the corporations, and upon their rescue from the "lion's grip'" depend the future of the public domain and the possibility of the other cases which gentlemen profess to fear.

The whole number of acres of the public domain granted in aid of railroads, canals, and military wagon-roads from 1824 down to June 30, 1880, is 155,504,994, of which 45,650,026 were patented or certified. Of the total, 7,372,882 acres were "patented or certified" under Fillmore's administration; under Pierce's administration, 14,886,396; under Lincoln's administration, 17,164,270; under Johnson's administration, 5,020,107; under Grant's administration, 1,203,689; showing the disappearance of land desirable even to railroads as a gift, and God knows what a railroad would not take as a gift no human being will want to pay for.

I take it that the Congress is not bound to a precedent like a bundle of little "nisi prius" lawyers; that each case which presents a principle will be decided upon that and not upon some future fear. I have scarcely found an opponent of this measure who has not frankly admitted that injustice has been done these settlers which he deeply deplored, and which, but for the precedent thereby to be established, he would willingly relieve.

Mr. Speaker, when my honorable colleagues refer to the precedents what do they mean? The precedents support this case. They must then, as I stated at the outset, refer to the prospective operation of this law. I submit it is not fair to answer a question of to-day by an objection of to-morrow. To-morrow never was a good answer to-day. Is this not the "begin-all" and "end-all" of the matter: What is wise—what is just? This answered all is answered, and I put that question to the conscience of you all. Gentlemen talk of the precedent of this case as though it would carry a penalty. There is no penalty to wisdom except that which comes from its disobedience, and justice is not pessimistic. This Congress has voted such relief in lesser cases almost every week of its existence; hence your objection to this case lies not to the right, but to the quantum of recovery; the settlers ought to have relief, but not what justice calls for.

Gentlemen tell me they would vote to repay to settlers what they have paid and interest. On the theory that this was not railroad land and only cost $1.25 an acre, the returns if it carried interest would amount to $3 per acre. If the settler paid double minimum price, as for land in railroad limits, $2.50 an acre, the return with interest would be $6 an acre. What they ask will not average the lesser amount, for in no case can they receive to exceed $3.50 an acre except where costs have been paid. But the objection to this system of reasoning is that it takes no account of those who have paid nothing but fees, having acquired title by homestead, by residence and improvement alone, and no return would be just that did not treat this most deserving class of men as the equals of any other claimant.

Some of my colleagues say they will vote to make the Government pay what the settlers paid without interest—the Government to pay for betterments (improvements). This would make it cost the Government not less than $10 an acre, nearly three times what is asked. All these settlers ask is what it costs them to buy in the paramount title. This they can get for not exceeding $3.50 per acre. If it costs more it is their loss, if less the Government's gain.

Some gentlemen express a fear that the passage of this bill will open the way for the relief of the settlers on the Des Moines River grant. I have studied that case, and without saying anything to the prejudice of claimants thereunder, I will say that there is no parity between the two, and the one will set no precedent for the other. The bill for their relief now before the House provides simply for the bringing of an action or actions by the United States to quiet their title, with the right on their part to join therein. In this connection I take the liberty to print in my remarks the following extract from the report of the majority of the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate, as bearing at least upon the sentiment of the bill under consideration:

Every interest, near or remote, connected with this unfortunate controversy will be promoted by the passage of the proposed bill; but the committee feel that the duty of Congress is especially to the poor and unfortunate people who went upon the lands in response to the invitation of the Government and in faith of its title. What they ask is moderate compared with their deserving, and it is difficult to see how objection can be made to a proposition that so serious and injurious a controversy shall be settled by the judgment of the highest court in the land.

And also the following from the report of the minority of that committee, as bearing directly upon the principle for which I contend in the bill under consideration:

Congress had better appropriate any amount of money to compensate the claimants of these lands for the losses they have sustained through the mistaken or improvident procedure of its land officers, than to attempt to avoid such a debt of justice by taking the land from one bona fide purchaser to give it to another bona fide pre-emptor or homestead claimant. It is better, in the opinion of the undersigned, that Congress should at once assume the duty and burden of making just compensation for losses that have been sustained by those who bought these lands from the United States, under the mistaken belief of the land officers that they were open to settlement and disposal as part of the public domain, and have lost the benefits of their purchases.

This report is signed by Senators Morgan, Dolph, Gibson, and

Mr. Speaker, these men are my constituents; they are more, my neighbors; they are still more, my comrades, for in the heroic days nearly nine-tenths of them were Unionsoldiers. This will not prejudice their case with you men of the South, for you were brave and must be generous and just. Nearly all of those for whom I plead are known to me personally, and accordingly I take a keen and personal interest in their rights and wrongs. I have known them from the "ground up," for I knew them when they lived in the earth, in "dugouts," and have watched them for years as they spread the seed and gathered the harvest which was the trust of the armies of laborers of the world. They have fought a brave fight and redeemed the desert of twenty years ago. They are of the class of men that Miller saw when he wrote these lines:

A race of unnamed giants these,
That moved like gods among the trees,
So stern, so stubborn-brow'd, and slow,
With strength of black-maned buffalo,
And each man notable and tall,
A kingly and unconscious Saul,
A sort of sullen Hercules.

They are not mendicants, for when the hell-blasts of the drought and the clouds of locust a few years ago reduced them to starvation they made no sign, asked no aid of the Government, as did those who saw made no sign, asked no and of the Government, as did those who saw their all devoured by the flames in Michigan or swept away by the floods of the Ohio or the Mississippi. They fought their battle alone, and what they ask now they ask not as alms but as justice, and to that answering justice in your consciences I commit their case, only regretting that my condition physically perhaps unfits me to represent them on this floor as they deserve to be represented.

Rivers and Harbors.

SPEECH

HON. M. C. GEORGE.

OF OREGON.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 18, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 8130) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I had intended to urge on this floor the adoption of amendments to several portions of the bill affecting my State, but on mature reflection, in view of the great difficulties in the way of succe ful amendment upon the House floor, the consequence of rejection, the impending dangers to the passage of any bill, and in view of past experience, I have deemed another plan of action more advisable and promising greater success ere this bill becomes a law.

I have ever been a friend of river and harbor improvement, full and broad in its spirit and nationality, and so long as I have a vote it shall be cast in favor of the use of our surplus public money for the public welfare. I must, however, take this occasion to call the attention of this House and the country to two of the great works in my State omitted in the bill as it stands.

I regret exceedingly that our committee has not included the improvement of the mouth of the Columbia River. Congress is committed to the work. Three years ago we appropriated $7,500 for a commission of engineers to examine and report on this project. Under that law a board of eminent engineers was constituted, who visited the locality and, so far as all practical purposes is concerned, unanimously agreed on the necessity, utility, and general plan of the work, and only differed in opinion as to the height to which the jetty would have to be raised and the distance out it would have to be projected, both of which points of differences experience must hereafter determine ere appropriation for that part is required. The minority thought that the good work could be accomplished without carrying the jetty so high or so The majority say as to height that-

The work proposed should be brought only to the level of low tide. If, however, experience should demonstrate the necessity for raising the jetty to any level greater than low water, it can be readily done on the lower jetty as a foundation.

As to length, they say:

This jetty is to stop short of a point three miles south of Cape Disappointment r be prolonged beyond it as experience may indicate to be necessary.

Another very gratifying feature is the reasonable prospect of the construction of this jetty at a cost much less than estimated by the engineers. In their report they say:

This jetty is expected to be mainly of stone, and the estimate is on that basis. Speaking of substituting wood for stone, they use these words:

A favorable circumstance is the apparent absence over a considerable length of the proposed work of the sea-worm (teredo navalis) which in some other sections of the country proves so very hurtful to structures of which wood is a part, and practically prohibits its use for works of a permanent character.

The estimated cost was on the basis of stone and beton blocks as material, but if, as is recommended by the engineers, mattresses and piling can be used, the cost will be greatly decreased. Whatever other beneficial causes may exist this much is certain, that the great quantity of fresh water at the mouth of the Columbia River is death to that greatest enemy of woodwork, the teredo; besides, the sands, from the great natural causes constantly operating, will pile up around and through the jetty to the utter destruction of this worm even in salt water.

In addition to this we find the Chief of Engineers, in his report, saying that-Experience on improvements at other Oregon coast entrances continues to be favorable for the prompt success and reduction of cost of the Columbia jetty.

Two years ago our House committee in the river and harbor bill gave the sum of $75,000 to commence this work under the recommendation the sum of $75,000 to commence this work under the recommendation of the board of engineers. This passed the House, but as the river and harbor bill died in the Senate it did not become a law. This was in the Forty-seventh Congress. In the river and harbor bill of last year this House concurred in a Senate amendment and $100,000 was voted to commence this great work; and now the Chief of Engineers asks for $500,000, and expresses the belief that the jetty it will enable to be constructed will "check the present shifting tendency of the channel southward, increase the depth, and give prompt relief to a large and increasing shiming."

increasing shipping."

Last December I introduced a bill to appropriate this sum. The importance of this work is national. Like some other great works located in my State its local benefit is not only to the State of Oregon but also to the Territories of Washington, Idaho, and a large portion of Montana. It will be also of national benefit in diverting a trade of a considerable portion of British Columbia into our territory.

This improvement will afford us over thirty feet of channel over the bar. The Columbia River entrance is directly out to the sea from the only break in a most formidable mountain range from Mexico to British Columbia. It will give us a great national harbor on the Pacific coast for the transcontinental trade to Asia; in fact, by it we promote the welfare of our whole commerce abroad.

I regret to learn that an erroneous impression exists in the minds of some of the members of the committee growing out of a supposed similarity of circumstances at the mouth of the Columbia River and Gulf ports where the prospective success of the submerged jetty system is being questioned.

At Galveston and other places the plan has been to build jetties over the bar, concentrating the flow of the water between the jetties, and thus clear out a channel between the jetty walls through the bar.

Engineers like Captain Eads claim that submerged jetties under such conditions will never do effective work for two reasons: First, the waste of water over them; and second, the deposit of sand between the jetties during every storm. They claim that the jetties should be carried been the second of the deposit of sand between the jetties during every storm. ried above the sea-level in order to utilize the limited flow of water in many of these bays and outlets and thus secure sufficient scouring capacity. This, however, would not apply to the mouth of the Columbia River, where the flow is probably over five times as great as in the south pass of the Mississippi where Eads placed his famous jetties. So also with the other objection that the sand will wash over the submerged jetty in storms and fill up and obliterate any channel which the current in calmer weather might be able to excavate. This, even if true elsewhere, has no application to our work at the Columbia River eneisewhere, has no application to our work at the Columbia River entrance. There only one jetty is to be constructed—Cape Disappointment already forming the other. This jetty is not to be across any bar and is not intended to deepen any channel alongside of it as at Galveston and other points. The jetty is to be placed on Clatsop Spit and will be several miles inside of the bar, and when the plan is carried out the old situation will have been restored which gave us thirty-five feet over the bar as in 1701 and thirty form feet in 1801. five feet over the bar as in 1791 and thirty-four feet in 1841.

So the objections to submerged jetties elsewhere do not apply to the Columbia River improvement, and even if they did we have already seen that the jetty can easily be raised to the sea-level. There can be no question about the perfect feasibility of this improvement.

Now a word, Mr. Chairman, concerning the other improvement left out by our House committee, namely, the one at Coos Bay. The Chief of Engineers in his last report informs us that notwithstanding "the natural channel was shifting and usually tortuous the amount already expended has afforded during the last three years a straighter and more stable channel." The estimates for the present year are $150,000, for which I introduced a bill early in the session. The Chief of Engineers says that he "expects the amount to make the depth permanent, which will have been gained, and further improve the channel direction, giving much benefit to a large and increasing coasting trade."

The local engineer states that "this stability is quite beneficial in preventing delay of bar crossings." He speaks of increased confidence in the channel as evidenced by crossings in rainy and cloudy weather or even after night.

Again he says:

Formerly each tug could tow out but one deep-draught vessel on a tide from the anchorage below Empire City; now the tugs take out three or four each on a tide.

This is a very important work and will be of great benefit to a large and rapidly developing section of Oregon.

National Board of Health.

SPEECH

HON. I. NEWTON EVANS.

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, February 25, 1885,

On the clause in the deficiency bill which abolishes the National Board of Health.

Mr. EVANS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The Committee on Public Health, of which I have the honor to be a member, is specially charged with the duty of investigating and reporting on matters affecting the public health. The committee recently submitted its views, and by order of this House their recommendation that an appropriation be made for continuing the work of the National Board of Health was referred to the Committee on Ap-

That committee has assumed not only to ignore the recommendation of the Public Health Committee, which has carefully investigated the subject with every facility for ascertaining the needs of the country in this direction, but has also attempted to repeal general legislation on this appropriation bill.

The clause to abolish the board, as provided on page 13, line 301, can not but be regarded as new legislation. While it may not be subject to a point of order for the reason that it decreases expenditures, but for that reason, if for no other, it has no business in this bill. The object of a deficiency bill is to make appropriations to pay the expenses of the Government incurred in excess of the sums appropriated for the last fiscal year. This can in no wise be regarded as a deficiency, and therefore is not germane.

It is claimed that there is no need of a national board of health.

Are we to take the dictum of members of the Committee on Appropriations on a subject over which they have no jurisdiction as against the formal report of the committee to which this House has specially confided the care of health matters? Is the Appropriations Committee to say to us this is needed and that is not needed, as may best serve its purpose, and are we to tamely submit to its dictation and under its whip and spur fly as it directs? If such is to be the decision, the sooner the whole House is merged in one huge appropriation committee the

The interests involved in the question under consideration are of too grave a character, too far-reaching and important in their results, to be passed over lightly or to be brushed away with the stroke of a pen.

The protection of human life and the promotion of the public health are questions of vital importance. To none of greater moment can the attention of the private citizen or the legislator be directed.

The question has been asked by some of the members of this House, What has been the work of the National Board of Health and what good has it accomplished? In answer to their inquiries I beg leave to print the following, which is a part of their report for the year 1884:

print the following, which is a part of their report for the year 1884:

II. The collection of information with regard to the sanitary condition of some of the principal cities and towns in the United States. Work in this direction was organized at the first session of the board by the printing, with additions and corrections, of a series of schedules of questions for the sanitary survey of a city; the original schedules for this purpose having been prepared several years previously by a committee of the American Public Health Association. A number of these schedules have been returned to the board properly filled up, and others are in course of completion. It is believed that the result has already been good in indicating the lines of inquiry which should be pursued by municipal authorities in relation to sanitary matters, and that hereafter a large amount of valuable information might be collected by this means.

III. The appointment of a commission to investigate yellow fever in the Island of Cuba, consisting of Dr. S. E. Chaillé and Col. T. S. Hardie, C. E., of New Orleans; Dr. John Guiterás, of Philadelphia; and Surgeon George M. Sternberg, United States Army.

From their report it appears that yellow fever must be considered as endemie in the Island of Cuba, and that for many years it has prevailed annually in the principal ports. The facts presented do not confirm the theory of the spontaneous origin of the yellow-fever poison on board ships, and make it improbable that the cleaning of the harbor of Havana and the constant renewal of its waters, however desirable, would prevent the infection of the shipping at this port.

IV. The standing committee of the board on sanitary legislation, consisting of Drs. H. I. Bowditch, S. M. Bemiss, and Stephen Smith, employed a competent legal authority of Boston to collect and collate the sanitary laws of the United States and of the several States, including not only the statutes but the decisions of the several courts, on all questions involving the public health.

This compilation was of great practical interest and utility to all interested in sanitary legislation.

V. At the request of the board, an investigation as to the best method of determining the amount and character of organic matter in the air was undertaken by Professor Ira Remsen, of the Johns Hopkins University of Baltimore.

VI. An investigation as to the effects of disinfectants, and especially of those used for disinfecting inclosed spaces, was undertaken by Dr. W. S. Bigelow, of Boston, assisted by Dr. H. P. Bowditch, professor of physiology, and Dr. Wood, professor of chemistry of Harvard University, the whole being under the general direction and advice of Dr. C. F. Folsom, secretary State board of health of Massachusetts.

VII. An investigation as to the composition and merits of the various patent disinfectants was made at the request of the board by Professor C. F. Chandler, of Columbia College, president of the board of health of New York city.

VIII. An investigation as to the prevalence of adulterations in food or drugs in the United States, under the direction of Dr. H. A. Johnson, chairman of the standing committee on this subject. In this connection a paper upon the deteriorations and adulterations of food was prepared for the board by Dr. R. M. Kedzie, president of the State board of health of Michigan, and a paper on the adulterations of drugs by Professor L. Diehl, of Louisville, Ky.

IX. A preliminary inquiry as to the diseases of food-producing animals of the United States, and the legislation, whether State or national, which seems desirable in regard to this subject. This was under the direction of a standing committee of the board, composed of Drs. J. L. Cabell, T.S. Verdi, and P. H. Bailhache, and special reports upon the subject for this committee were

I, with a view to determining the most efficient and least expensive form of sewers.

It may be observed that the results of this investigation have already been of practical importance, since it was the presentation of a portion of these results to the committee charged with the sanitary survey of Memphis which led that committee to recommend a scheme for the sewerage of that city, based on the researches of Colonel Warring, estimated to cost about $255,000, in preference to a plan of sewerage prepared in the ordinary manner and estimated to cost $500,000.

XI. A sanitary survey of the eastern coast of New Jersey bordering on New York Harbor was made with the aid of this board, under the direction of the State board of health of New Jersey.

XII. A sanitary survey of the city of Memphis, Tenn., was commenced as soon after the close of the epidemic as possible, under the direction of a special committee of the National Board of Health, of which Dr. J.S. Billings was chairman. A preliminary report of this committee was prepared to meet the urgent demand on the part of the municipal authorities for advice as to the course to be pursued.

demand on the part of the municipal authorities for advice as to the course to be pursued.

XIII. An investigation as to the hygiene of the mercantile marine and as to what legislation is expedient to improve its sanitary condition. Surgeon P. H. Bailhache, U. S. M. H. S., was especially detailed by the chief of that bureau to prepare this report.

XIV. An investigation by Dr. Elisha Harris, of New York, upon diphtheria as it occurred in Northern Vermont.

XV. An investigation by Professor Raphael Pumpelly, of the United States Geological Survey, upon the influence of various soils upon sanitation, especially with regard to drainage and methods of disposal of excreta.

XVI. An investigation by Drs. H. C. Wood and H. F. Formad, of Philadelphia, as to the effects of inoculating lower animals with diphtheritic exudation.

XVII. Researches by Dr. G. M. Sternberg, United States Army, upon suspended particles in the air of places liable to infection, which were commenced in Havana and continued in New Orleans. These researches included an investigation upon organized particles from swamps and other malarious localities, with the view of testing the accuracy of the observations of Klebs and Tomassi-Crudeli, and others, on the existence of spores alleged to be the producing cause of malarial fevers.

XVIII. A report by Dr. J. J. Woodward, United States Army, on the pathological history of yellow fever.

XIX. A report by Professor Abbe, of the Signal Service Bureau, on the possible relations between meteorological phenomena and vital statistics, and especially on the graphical methods of representing such data.

XX. An investigation by Col. G. E. Waring, jr., of Newport, R. I., on the influence on the water-seal of traps of different kinds of currents of water passing through them or through the pipes into which they deliver, under a variety of conditions, covering ventilation, copious or partial, and induced currents arising from the passage of water over the branches of different form and arrangement, including experiments with regard to siphoning and the best manner to secure an adequate flush for water-closets, drains, &c.

XXI. An investigation by Professor Ira Remsen, of the Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, as to the amount of carbonic oxide in furnace-heated rooms, XXII. XXIII. A report by Dr. Charles Smart on the water-supply of Mobile and New Orleans.

XXIV. A sanitary survey of selected portions of Baltimore city was undertaken by this board, in compliance with the request of the city council, by Dr. C. W. Chancellor, secretary of the State board of health.

XXV. Experimental investigations, by George M. Sternberg, surgeon U. S. A., relating to the ctiology of the malarial fevers.

XXVI. A report upon the sewerage systems of the principal cities of Europe, by Rudolph Hering, sanitary engineer.

XXVII. An investigation on the best method of determining the quantity of organic matter in potable water, and the specific effects of variously contaminated water on the health of persons who have used it, by Prof. J. W. Mallet, of the University of Virginia.

XXVIII. An investigation into the sanitary condition of summer resorts, by E. W. Bowditch, sanitary engineer.

XXIX. An investigation into the conditions of arsenical poisoning by means of emanations from wall-papers, carpets, and other furniture containing arsenical coloring matter, by Professor Wood, of Harvard University.

XXX. An investigation into the conditions under which different styles of traps lose their water-seal by siphon action, by George E. Waring, jr., S. E., Edward S. Philbrick, C. E., and Ernest W. Bowditch, S. E.

XXXI. An inquiry into the causes and nature of malaria, with special reference to the conditions of its recent prevalence in the States of New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts, was commenced, with the approval and co-operation of the several State boards of health, who were to furnish the topographical and elinical data, while the scientific investigation of the essential nature of the malarial poison by experimental processes similar to those of Klebs, Tomassi-Crudeli, and Sternberg was assigned to Dr. J. D. Whitney, of Boston.

This investigation was regarded by this board as likely to lead to very important results in their bearing upon the public health of an extensive region recently invaded by malarial fever. It was clearly such an investigation as was within the scope of the duties assigned to the board by the act of March 3, 1579, and as relating to a subject in which the entire country is more or less interested, was one for which the service of a national board of health was eminently appropriate. It is deeply to be regretted, in the interests of the public health, that it has been necessarily abandoned for want of an appropriation applicable to such purposes.

propriate. It is deeply to be regretted, in the interests of the public health, that it has been necessarily abandoned for want of an appropriation applicable to such purposes.

XXXII. A report of the various forms of legislation by which, in this country, attempts have been made to secure registration of vital statistics, with appended copies of all the various acts passed up to the present time, together with a brief historical sketch of the progress of registration in each State and the results obtained. There is also appended a table showing the results of an analysis of the various registration laws, so arranged that each can be readily compared with the others in regard to any particular item.

The results of the investigations above referred to have, in those cases in which the work has been completed, been transmitted to Congress with previous reports. Despite the limited circulation which has been given to these reports (only the usual 1,000 copies of each having as yet been printed) it is difficult to exaggerate the interest which has been awakened in the subjects treated, both in our own and in foreign countries. It is with feelings of national pride that we are able to record the commendations pronounced upon these efforts by eminent scientists and sanitarians both at home and abroad. The demand for these reports, both from our own people and from foreign countries, has far exceeded the provision made by Congress, and it is earnestly recommended that additional copies be authorized. It can hardly be expected that provision can be made for supplying all applicants with copies, but it is respectfully submitted the value attached to these reports by the medical profession, by sanitary engineers, and others interested in the advance of sanitary science warrant the publication of a sufficient number of copies to enable us to supply the public and college libraries of the country and the Government and other sanitary organizations abroad.

a sufficient number of copies to enable us to supply the public and college libraries of the country and the Government and other sanitary organizations abroad.

SANITARY LEGISLATION.

The establishment of the National Board of Health and the success which attended its efforts in battling with the epidemic of 1879 awakened the liveliest interest in preventive measures throughout the country. The advantages to be derived from systematic organization and execution of sanitary regulations were practically demonstrated, and the methods of dealing with epidemics inaugurated by the board continue to receive universal support and co-operation. The impulse thus given to the study of all questions relating to general sanitation has resulted in a rapid increase in the number of State and local sanitary organizations. State boards of health or sanitary organizations bearing similar relations to the State governments are now provided for in twenty-seven States of the Union, while local organizations have been established in many of the important towns, as also in many of the counties throughout several of the States. Insome of the States, or the states and local sanitary organizations perfected, which have not only already accomplished great good, but which also give promise of the most satisfactory results in the future.

To all efforts made to improve the sanitary condition of the country and prevent the spread of disease the national board has given its most earnest and hearty co-operation, and it is to be hoped that ere long there will be not only a State board of health in every State, but also a local board in every county and township throughout the country. It is to the application of preventive measures now known, and of others which will yet be discovered, that we must look, in a very great degree, for an improvement in the physical condition of the people, for a limitation upon the people, and a consequent increase in both the available strength and wealth of the nation. Much has already been added to the way of

The National Board of Health has been in existence since March, The National Board of Health has been in existence since march, 1879, and during that period has rendered services to the country which can only be estimated by hundreds of millions of dollars. The effect of the report of a single case of yellow fever in the Mississippi Valley, in the absence of the power, influence, and regulations of the National Board of Health has been to depress the price of produce in Western markets to the extent of many thousands of dollars in a single day, the commerce of the entire Mississippi Valley has been disturbed, and uncertainty and dread have pervaded the cities and towns along all her rivers.

Compare the condition of things prior to the organization of the National Board of Health with that which has prevailed under its direction. In 1878, yellow fever swept from the Gulf of Mexico to Ohio. A hundred towns were invaded by the dread disease; desolation marked its course. Individuals, towns, cities, and States were powerless. The disease sped on; commerce was destroyed, and while the coffers of the sympathizing people of the North were unlocked and money was poured out with lavish hand to minister to the necessities of the sick and dying, all stood in awe, utterly helpless before the fell destroyer, until a hundred thousand cases and twenty thousand deaths made up the record of that fatal year.

Then came the call for a national board of health, and Congress was prompt to respond. With the recollections of 1878 still fresh in mind s hastened to provide for the board, clothed it with power, and congress hastened to provide for the board, clothed it with power, and furnished it with $500,000 to be used in protecting the country from the ravages of disease. Before the board had scarcely organized yellow fever broke out again. But mark the contrast. There are those on this floor who passed through those years of sorrow, grief, and death, and they can tell us of what use was the National Board of Health.

They can tell us that order was brought out of confusion; that confidence took the place of fear; that shotgun quarantines were banished; that compares controlled by sorriery regulations, was to mismed displaced.

fidence took the place of fear; that shotgun quarantines were banished; that commerce, controlled by sanitary regulations, went on unimpeded; that the disease, instead of spreading throughout the country, was confined almost wholly to the few towns in which it broke out early in the season. Instead of 100,000 cases there were but 2,000, and instead of 20,000 deaths there were 800. It may be argued that the material for yellow fever was used up in 1878; but the increased malignancy of the disease in 1879, as shown by the excessive mortality, which was 33 per cent. greater, demonstrates conclusively that but for the control exercised by the National Board of Health it would have spread far and wide. and wide.

As regards the effect upon the business of the Mississippi Valley in 1879, the secretary of the State board of health of Illinois states that the Illinois Central Railread received from the South from July to October of that year over 100,000 tons of freight more than during the same period in 1878, while the passenger travel, which was almost wholly suspended in 1878, was scarcely interrupted in 1879, and that this result could not possibly have been reached without the co-operation of the National Board of Health, and that the utmost exertions of the board were required at all times to allay the fears of local authorities.

National Board of Health, and that the utmost exercions of the board were required at all times to allay the fears of local authorities.

From that day to the present the people of the Mississippi Valley have known that epidemics can be controlled. From that day to the present they have been calling upon Congress to provide the board with means for protecting the people of the country.

The unanimous voice of the cities and towns, of railroad and steamboat companies and State and local health organizations, was that the boat companies, and State and local health organizations, was that the services rendered by the board were invaluable, and they are pressing us now to clothe the board with all the power necessary to continue its beneficent services.

But we are met with the reply that there is no need of two organizations to perform the same service; that the Marine-Hospital Service can do all that is needed to be done.

do all that is needed to be done.

I do not propose to discuss or criticise the Marine-Hospital Service. As a medical man, I know for what purpose it was called into and is kept in being. Other members of the profession on this floor know as well as I the sphere of duties belonging to that service. Its field is in curative measures. It deals with sick sailors, while the National Board of Health operates in the field of preventive medicine, which is totally different, wholly foreign to the duties devolving legitimately upon the Marine-Hospital Service.

But whether the Marine-Hospital Service can perform satisfactorily to the country the duties belonging to the National Board of Health, I leave to the people and the various health organizations to say. The American Medical Association, the representative association of the profession in this country, has placed itself on record strongly in favor of supporting the National Board of Health, and their petition is now on the files of this House.

on the files of this House.

The American Public Health Association, embracing in its membership all the professions and many branches of business, numbering among its members the most distinguished sanitarians in the country, whose only aim is the public weal, this organization sends to us year by year its petition that the National Board of Health may be supported. Can it be alleged that these men, many of whom are dealing daily with disease in all its phases, do not know what is required? Shall we disregard the voice of the multitude, who tell us what the country needs, and be guided by the opposing voices of two or three who would destroy the national board?

Hear what the American Public Health Association says concerning the National Board of Health:

Resolved, That there is a work to be done by such a board which can not be done by any local or State board, and which is not, and can not be, adequately represented or fulfilled by any other branch of the national service, as illustrated in its inspections and inquiries into special conditions so serious as to be national rather than local; and its dealings with yellow fever and small-pox; in its plans for consular health bills from foreign ports and refuge stations for a wide constrange; in its internal care over river and railroad transportation; in its investigation into malaria and other widespread causes of disease; in its valuable scientific and practical inquiries into the causes and courses of epidemics; in its comparisons of statistical facts, and in the widespread distribution of information most intimately affecting the vital conditions of our whole population.

Resolved, That while each State and each division of national service any contribute much aid in their respective spheres, we view with regret any curtailment of the functions of a board so constituted as to represent and unify the health interests of the entire nation.

Resolved, That we counsel the national board to continue all the work possible under the present restricted appropriations, and await with sonfidence the extension of its powers of usefulness, and that appreciation of its work for the past and its necessity for the future which can but result from a calm and careful estimate of the safeguards requisite for national health and prosperity.

Resolved, That the confining the work of the board to cholera, yellow fever, and small-pox is believed to be in the highest degree injudicious. It should have the full powers for investigation of all preventable diseases conferred upon it by its constituting act and be granted the funds necessary for this purpose; and this should be done irrespective of the action which may be taken with reand this should be done irrespective of the action which may be taken with regard to quarantine.

Resolved, That the members of the American Public Health Association hereby pledge their individual co-operation in endeavoring to secure such national legislation as shall insure to the National Board of Health such material aid as may be needful in carrying out with the greatest efficiency all measures pertaining to the interest of public health.

Resolved, That the advisory council of this association, representing, as it does, the sanitarians of the various States, be directed to use all laudable efforts to place before the President of the United States and the Congress at Washington and before members of Congress in their several States the very great importance to the welfare of the country of such action by the United States of vernment as shall increase to the fullest extent the means and powers of usefulness of the National Board of Health.

Resolved, That so long as the United States Government confines its maritime, and inland quarantine service to the aiding of State and local boards of health, it is essential, for the best results, that such aid should be through channels most generally acceptable to State and local boards of health, whose co-operation is requisite; and we sincerely believe that the National Board of Health is the channel most generally acceptable.

In addition to these well-known associations we have the resolutions

In addition to these well-known associations we have the resolutions adopted by the Sanitary Council of the Mississippi Valley, together with their memorial to the President of the United States, asking—their memorial to the President of the United States, asking—

That $100,000 be placed at the disposal of the National Board of Health, in the event of an outbreak of yellow fever, or other epidemic, on the coast of our country. That body can give confidence to the people of the valley as to the necessary precautions and safeguards yearly demanded by the exposure of our southern ports to ravages of yellow fever. Their inspection stations and the mode their officers have adopted in isolation and disinfection, establishing quarantine only when emergency or occasion demands it, have earned for the national board a degree of confidence that of itself alone is worth millions of dollars to the commerce of the country.

To supplant this body, or withhold from it the necessary funds to maintain inspection stations at all exposed points, will, in our humble judgment, clog the wheels of commerce, by bringing about a feeling of distrust on the first alarm, be it true or false, and cause recourse to the shotgun policy of quarantine, which can but prove destructive to the commercial interests of the Missispip Valley, which in a measure affect those of the entire Union.

On motion, the draught of the memorial was approved, engrossed, and signed by the delegates from the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, Michigan, Wisconsin, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Mississippi, and directed to be forwarded to the President at Washington.

We also have the petition of the president and secretary of the State board of health of New York: In their own behalf, and on behalf of that board of health of New York: In their own behalf, and on behalf of that organization, they say that notwithstanding there are now twenty-nine State boards in existence, "which are beginning a great work in and for their respective States, the particular function of the National Board of Health can not be exercised by any or all of these State boards." Neither the naval, the military, nor the Marine Hospital Service can in the least fill the position and exercise the functions of a national health service. The duty, dignity, and sanitary welfare of the nation seem alike to warrant the conclusion that the National Board of Health health and a the advice of the Board at the National Board of Health should, under the advice of the President, be charged with all duties for which it was called into existence, and that in its relations to the State, interstate, and international public health interests the confidence and regard which are entertained for the board should be sufficient for imparting to the board all the official dignity and right which its high character actually merits.

high character actually merits.

The nations and people in all lands have good reason to expect such a course to be pursued toward the National Board of Health of the United States. The people of the American States look for it and will demand it. Public hygienists understand the necessity for it, and they, with the statesmen of the nations, point to the fact that contagious pests which are current in the foreign cities and countries are soon current in the United States. Even leprosy of distant lands is among our people, and the fevers and contagia of immigrants are being planted where the migrants move from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The national board's work and its scientific researches in the arts of disease-prevention are national.

The undersigned are aware that the factious and acrimonous opposition and unworthy criticism which sprang up against the national board some months ago have been used as means for organizing a permanent kind of force against it at Washington; but this must not militate against the continued life and usefulness of that branch of the public service. It has the confidence and ardent good will of the State boards of health and of all the most trusted sanitarians in this country and in Europe.

Congress not to abolish the National Board of Health.

The query may arise in the minds of some of the members of this House why was it necessary for these health organizations to petition Congress and the President of the United States not to cripple or abolish the National Board of Health? The reason is apparent: From self-ish or jealous motives a factious opposition sprang up against the board; they succeeded in convincing that portion of the members of the House who have a mania for economy and reform that all the duties of the National Board of Health could be as efficiently performed by the Man National Board of Health could be as efficiently performed by the Marine-Hospital Service. The Appropriations Committee accordingly, in 1882, incorporated into the sundry civil bill a provision that the board of health should not expend more than $125,000, and provided that no other moneys should be used for the purposes of the board; and March 3, 1883, they gave the board only $10,000. Last year (1884) they gave the board nothing, and they now come before this House not only ignoring the recommendations of the Public Health Committee to give the board $25,000 to pay their per diem and necessary expenses and to place at the discretion of the President of the United States $500,000 to be expended through such governmental agencies as he may designate, but they have inserted a clause in the bill to abolish entirely the National Board of Health.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that all the health organizations of the country and the best sanitarians of the land are ardent advocates of a national board of health, I can not help regarding the action of the of a national board of nearth, I can not help regarding the action of the Appropriations Committee as unwise and inconsiderate, especially at this time, when we are supposed to be facing a most fearful and fatal epidemic, which has passed beyond the limits of its home in Asia to Southern and Western Europe. From past experience of all former epidemics of cholera, together with such frequent and rapid communication with England and the continent, we can not escape the conviction that we shall have a second such as a facility of the second such as a second such a tion that we shall have more or less of this disease in proportion to the sanitary measures adopted in the United States the coming summer and

The protection of human life and the promotion of the public health is an important duty, which we as legislators have no right to overlook, and a fearful responsibility rests on those members of this House who would destroy any of the means, and especially the best organized means, at our command to prevent the introduction and spread of such a malignant, infectious, or contagious disease as that of Asiatte cholera.

Foreign governments have had for many years past national sanitary organizations, which they support and encourage by liberal appropria-tions. During this Congress we have appropriated $150,000 for the intions. During this Congress we have appropriated $150,000 for the investigation and prevention of pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases of the lower animals; we appropriate annually for a light-house system, the object of which is the protection of life as well as property, more than $2,000,000, and for the Life-Saving Service notless than $700,000, and now we are told that $300,000 is enough to place in the hands of the President, and perhaps it is, if you are going to destroy the best and most efficient medium through which it should be used.

Mr. Chairman, I have not discussed the legal bearings of the question e are considering; I shall leave that to those whose profession is the we are considering; I shall leave that to those whose profession is the law. Suffice it to say, that I believe Congress has power to regulate commerce for the purpose of giving greater security to the health and lives of her citizens, and the powers conferred by the Constitution in the general-welfare clause, when it becomes actually necessary for self-protection, fully authorizes the establishment and support of the National Board of Health.

In conclusion, I would say that from what the board has done in the past, for what its past success promises for the future, and in view of the threatened epidemic from abroad, I beg that every member on this floor who has the interests of his countrymen at heart will vote to strike out that clause in this bill which abolishes the National Board of Health.

Reciprocity with Mexico.

SPEECH

HON. ABRAM S. HEWITT,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 27, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 7365) to carry into effect a convention between the United States of America and the United States of Mexico, signed on the 29th day of January, 1883.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, said:
Mr. SPEAKER: On the 4th of March next will begin the last Presidential term of the first century of our existence under the Constitution.
It is difficult to form any just idea of the contrast presented by this countries the form of the Government of t try at this time with its condition at the time of the formation of the Government. That 3,000,000 of people have expanded into a population of nearly 60,000,000 in less than a century does not express the transformation which has taken place in the condition of the people. When the Revolution closed wealth had been destroyed. The men who had gained the victory staked everything on the great issue of freedom and independence. In the hour of victory, however, they found themselves without any of the luxuries of civilization. Food, indeed, they had, and shelter more or less comfortable, but the Continental army went home in rags, and often barefooted. Their families were clad in homespun; their money had become worthless, and they were reduced, in the small exchanges which they were able to make, to the rude process of barter. From Massachusetts to Georgia there was what Madison described as "a wonderful anarchy of trade."

What a contrast is now presented to this state of affairs! We are toernment. That 3,000,000 of people have expanded into a population day the richest people in the world in the elements of power, whether for industry or for expenditure in war or peace. Under the policy laid down by the fathers who formed the Constitution our resources have been developed until we produce an excess of all the manufactured products which go to make up the comfort and life of modern civiliza-tion. I do not undervalue the stimulating effects of the protective policy under which the industry of this country has grown to its present gigantic proportions. I am not prepared to say whether the same results would or would not have been reached under a freer system of trade. I accept the situation as I find it, and I am willing to concede whatever merit may belong to the protective system for producing these vast results. What concerns me now is the fact that the capacity of this country to produce the staple articles needed by man for his comfort far exceeds the demand for these articles. I think the estimate which has been made of our ability in six months to produce all that we consume in a year is not exaggerated.

LESSONS OF THE ELECTION.

Such a state of things suggests the idea of general prosperity and universal comfort, and yet we stand face to face with the opposite condi-tion of affairs. The most careful estimates show that in the midst of all this abundance about 13 per cent. of our laboring population are unable to get employment, and that their families are suffering for the necessaries of life. I doubt whether at any previous period in the history of the country so large a percentage of the laborers of the country have been out of employment. This fact, in my judgment, had more to do with the result of the late election than any of the causes to which the popular judgment has assigned the triumph of the Democratic When there is general employment and consequent contentment the popular judgment inclines little to change of administration. The people act upon the principle of quieta non movere, but when they feel the pinch of poverty, without pretending to settle the question of cause and effect, a change of government at least offers a reasonable and ready step toward a change of business.

The Republican party, to whom may be accorded the merit, whatever it may be, of persisting in the protective policy in their platform in Chicago, failed to realize the fact that the home market no longer afforded an adequate receptacle for the products of our industry. They offered no relief to a suffering people, but proclaimed in terms more decided than they had ever ventured before to use their adherence to the doctrine of protection for the sake of protection, and their reliance upon the home market for the products of industry. The common sense of the people realized what the Republican leaders failed to see, that the home market was no longer adequate, and that if the restrictive policy was persisted in we should perish in the midst of our abundance. The people, therefore, decreed a change, not merely of servants but of policy. The significance of the late election to my mind is the decision of the people in favor of wider markets for our manufactured products.

The incoming administration will fail to give effect to the popular will unless most energetic steps are taken to make it possible for our people to reach the open markets of the world with the products of their industry.

THE RECENT TREATIES.

The present administration, which has shown that it is governed by very enlightened and conservative views, has not been slow to recognize the popular will as expressed in the late election. It is creditable to the administration that it has lost no time in striving to give effect to the will of the people. It has shown courage in recognizing the inevitable, even though it has been forced to abandon the declarations of the Chicago platform upon which the Republicans made the recent Presidential campaign. It would have been an absurdity for the administration to seek wider markets for commodities which could be supplied to our customers by other nations at lower cost than we could furnish them. Hence, by the very logic of the situation, the administration was compelled to declare in favor of free raw materials, by which alone the cost of our manufactured products could be reduced. We tax raw mate-We can not hope to compete with nations who work upon untaxed raw materials.

All provisions for drawbacks on the exportation of goods are troublesome and ineffective. Hence, looking out into the world to find a market for our manufactured products, the administration saw clearly that Europe was equally troubled with surplus products, and could take little or nothing from us but raw materials. It saw clearly that the great market for finished products was in our own hemisphere; that already we buy from the American nations far more than we sell to them, and that upon equal terms, on the well-recognized principle that all commerce is an exchange of equal values, we could get this business, provided we could offer commodities upon equally favorable terms. But it is evident that the only appeal which would be effective must be to the interests and not to the political sympathies of our neigh-bers on the south. The administration recognized the fact that treaties alone could not secure for us the markets which we desired, but that with the conditions for economical production equalized as they would be by the freeing of raw materials from duty we could hope to secure the trade of our neighbors, provided certain impediments in the way of navigation and special privileges conceded to other nations could be overcome. The administration, therefore, addressed itself to this great.—ties under consideration. The Mexican treaty was made on the 20th of undertaking, and if it has failed in any respect it has not been for want of zeal, but rather for want of time to fully weigh and measure all the interests involved in so great a departure from our traditional policy. Certainly no one can complain that it has not covered the field of operations with its diplomacy. It has given us treaties with Spain, with Nicaragua, with San Domingo, and a promise of treaties with all the other powers whose markets we can hope to secure. In fact, the public mind has been dazed by the exhibition to which it has suddenly been invited. After a long period of repose, as dignified as it was uneventful, the drama of the administration closes with a grand transformation scene, in which the glorious future of unrestricted commerce and of profitable exchanges is accompanied with the usual incidents of floods of light and tempting beauties, which I trust will not prove as illusory and tinseled as the scenes with which we are familiar upon

OBJECTIONS URGED.

My only concern with these treaties on the present occasion will be to distinguish them in their origin, their details, and their effects from the Mexican treaty now under consideration. I shall not attempt to pass judgment upon the merits or demerits of these new treaties. At the proper time they will come up for consideration, and at that time each member of this House must be prepared with his judgment. My purpose now is merely to show that the objections which have been made to the recent diplomatic achievements of the administration are not applicable to the Mexican treaty.

So far as I have been able to observe, the objections urged against the treaties now pending before the Senate are threefold: first, that the negotiation of these treaties forecloses the policy of the incoming administration; second, that so far as they affect the commerce and revenue of the country, the constitutional rights of Congress and of this House have been infringed by the initiative taken by the executive branch of the Government; third, that the effect of the proposed treaties will so far reduce the revenue as to make the tariff revision called for in the platforms of both parties difficult if not impossible.

Let us consider these objections briefly in detail for the sole purpose of ascertaining whether any of them are applicable to the Mexican treaty now under consideration. It is true that the new administration would find itself committed to a policy inaugurated by its predecessor in its closing hours, which might be embarrassing, because its scope and details might not meet with the approbation of the new administration after the properties of the new administration after the new administration ter more careful examination and deliberation than can possibly be given to so great a question in the short time which intervenes between now and the 4th of March next. It is certainly true that this consideration is strengthened by the fact to which I have referred, that the new policy is a departure from the Republican practice and declarations, and is an attempt to put into operation the principles laid down by the Democratic platform, which declares itself to be in favor of an "American continental policy, based upon more intimate commercial and political rela-tions with the fifteen sister republics of North, Central, and South America, but entangling alliances with none."

To the execution of this policy no doubt the incoming administration will direct its earnest energies, but if it should find in the way hasty and ill-considered arrangements already executed, especially if they should turn out to be unfavorable to us, it would be exceedingly difficult to secure the modifications required by equity and a due re-gard for our own interests. Moreover, in the past history of the coun-try outgoing administrations have acted upon the theory of clearing the way for the new administration and of leaving it as free as possible for the inauguration of the policy indicated by the transfer of power from one party to the other party.

SEWARD'S VIEWS.

Mr. Seward, in 1853, speaking upon resolutions offered by General Cass in regard to our relations with Spain and the acquisition of Cuba, used the following language:

But while thus expressing my devotion to those principles I can not too strongly express myself against the manner in which they have been brought in issue here on this occasion. The issue is made at a time, and under circumstances, which render it inevitable that we must fail, signally fail, in maintaining the great principles which it involves.

This issue is raised at a wrong time. We are more than half way through a session constitutionally limited to ninety days, and engaged with vast and various subjects, which can not be disposed of without long and most discursive debate.

I think the issue is raised in a wrong way. Practically, and by custom, the President of the United States holds the initiative of measures affecting foreign relations. The President now in the Executive House will go out in thirty days, and his sanction, even if we had it, would therefore be of no value. But even that sanction, such as it would be, is withheld—and I must confess rightly withheld. The people have elected a new President, wha is just ready to enter on administration, and upon whom the responsibilities of the conduct of foreign relations, for four years at least, must rest. Not only do we not know what his opinions on this question are, but our action would anticipate the publication of those opinions, and embarrass—is it too strong an expression to say, factiously embarrass—the incoming administration.—Seward's Works, volume III, page 611.

For one I am free to say that the views of Mr. Seward meet with my entire concurrence, and I think this House should act upon this view, and if the Mexican treaty came within the range of this doctrine I should cease to advocate its approval at this time. But there is no

January, 1883, fully two years ago. The treaty was ratified by the Senate and by Mexico, and was reported favorably to the House for its approval before the recent Presidential conventions were held, and of course before the nomination and election of Cleveland. It is therefore absolutely free from the objection that in any respect it would tie the hands of the incoming President, for it was made and ratified by an administration in the regular course of its duties, and long in advance of the knowledge that there would be any change of administra-The first objection therefore, it seems to me, is absolutely disposed of.

CONSTITUTIONAL OBJECTION.

The second objection to commercial treaties, that they infringe upon the constitutional rights of Congress to regulate commerce and of this House to initiate revenue measures, is one of a far more serious character. Recently in the Senate the doctrine has been advanced, so far as I know for the first time, that there is no constitutional power residing anywhere to make commercial treaties of any kind whatever. I shall leave the discussion of this question to gentlemen who profess to be learned in the Constitution, contenting myself with the observation that when this Government was formed it found three commercial treaties in existence which it recognized; that the administration of Washington proceeded to negotiate commercial treaties, and did negotiate the Jay treaty, which was approved by the House of Representatives; that every administration from the time of Washington to the time of Arthur has either negotiated, or attempted to negotiate, commercial treaties, and that no statesman of any standing has ever questioned the validity of such treaties. A distinguished Senator has indeed cited the great authority of Daniel Webster in opposition to treaties of reciprocity, but he gave no reference for his authority except that of a brother Senator, who, in his turn, did not state where the declaration was to be found. The language alleged to have been used by Webster is certainly peculiar. He is quoted as saying:

I hope I know the Constitution of my country better than to think a reciprocity treaty is constitutional.

I have searched the works of Daniel Webster in vain for this state So far from my finding it, I discover recommendations made by Mr. Webster, when Secretary of State, in favor of separate commercial treaties with the Hanse Towns, and the recommendation is based distinctly upon the ground that we may thus secure larger markets for our cotton, sugar, tobacco, and rice. There is the most distinct recognition of the right to make such treaties, the question only of expediency being submitted to the President. He says, in conclusion:

Such being the general nature of the association (Zollverein) and such our commercial intercourse with it, it becomes a matter of interest to consider how far our relations with its several members might be beneficially extended; and if it be thought advisable to enter into commercial treatics with them, or any of them, it will remain to be determined whether powers for such a purpose should be conferred upon the minister of the United States at Berlin, or some other diplomatic agency adopted, the general object being to seek the means of enlarging the consumption of the staples of the United States in Germany and of securing all practical benefit to their navigation.

But, if it be alleged that Webster drew a distinction between commercial treaties and treaties of reciprocity, and regarded the latter as unconstitutional, then the language of his speech made at Albany in 1844 would seem to determine what his views were beyond all question.

He says:

We hear much of reciprocity, and I take the rule upon this subject to be well laid down by a distinguished gentleman from another section of the United States (Hon. Mr. Berrien, of Georgia) whom you will probably have the pleasure of hearing when I shall have relieved your patience, that reciprocity is a matter to be secured with foreign nations when it is evidently a true reciprocity, but I have yet to learn from some new dictionary that a system of reciprocity is a system with advantages only on one side. I am for reciprocity reatles—no. I will not say treaties, but arrangements, for the whole power over the subject lies with Congress and not with the treaty-making power. But I am for a real reciprocity; not such as was provided by the treaty arrangement lately negotiated, and which the Senate, greatly to their honor in my judgment, rejected.

* * I will, in my judgment, be one of the first duties of the new administration, if we get one, to revise the whole of that matter, to take care that we protect ourselves, and not to rely on the good-will of our national competitors.

Here is the most explicit declaration possible in favor not only of treaties of reciprocity, but of commercial conventions.

Again, in the letter which Mr. Cushing was to deliver to the Emperor of China, Mr. Webster uses the following language:

The Chinese love to trade with our people and to sell them tea and silk, for which our people pay silver and sometimes other articles. But if the Chinese and the Americans will trade, there should be rules, so that they shall not break your laws, nor our laws. Our minister, Caleb Cushing, is authorized to make a treaty to regulate trade. Let it be just. Let there be no unfair advantage on either side.

An extract from the speech of Mr. Webster, delivered in the Senate in 1846, in defense of the treaty of Washington, has been given in the newspapers as the authority for the statement that Mr. Webster held commercial treaties to be unconstitutional. But there is no warrant for any such conclusion. He merely reaffirmed his old position that the Executive and Senate alone cannot make such treaties, or arrangements, as he prefers to call them. He holds that they must have the concurrence of Congress. But even to this position he admits that there may be exceptions. His language is as follows:

It is true a treaty is the law of the land. But, then, as the whole business of revenue and general provision for all the wants of the country is undoubtedly a very peculiar business of the House of Representatives or of Congress, I am of opinion, and always have been, that there should be no encroachment upon it by the exercise of the treaty-making power, unless in case of great and evident necessity. There have been some cases of necessity, like that of the convention with France for the acquisition of Louisiana.

So far, then, as Webster is concerned there is no denial of the constitutional power to make commercial treaties or arrangements. He expressly affirms the power, but declares that it can not be exercised without the concurrence of Congress.

But it will be observed that Mr. Webster takes the ground that commercial treaties are subject to the superior action of Congress. He dissents from the view that they may be made by the President and Senate independently of the concurrent action of the House. In this respect he seems to stand upon the positions of the report made by the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the Twenty-eighth Congress, when the Wheaton treaty was under consideration, and finally rejected by the Senate. The language of this report was only partially quoted in the speech made by Senator MORRILL. I therefore give it in full, in order that the House may not be misled by the imperfect extract which has lately been reproduced in the Senate:

lately been reproduced in the Senate:

In the judgment of the committee, the Legislature is the department of Government by which commerce should be regulated and laws of revenue passed. The Constitution in terms communicates the power to regulate commerce and to impose duties to that department. It communicates it, in terms, to no other. Without engaging at all in an examination of the extent, limits, and objects of the power to make treaties, the committee believe that the general rule of our system is, indisputably, that the control of trade and the function of taxing belong, without abridgment or participation, to Congress.

They infer this from the language of the Constitution, from the nature and principles of our Government, from the theory of republican liberty itself, from the unvaried practice, evidencing the universal belief of all, in all periods, and of all parties and opinions. They think, too, that, as the general rule, the Representatives of the people, sitting in their legislative capacity, with open doors, under the eye of the country, communicating freely with their constituents, may exercise this power more intelligently, more discreetly; may acquire more accurate and more minute information concerning the employments and the interests on which this description of measures will press, and may better discern what true policy prescribes or rejects, than is within the competence of the executive department of the Government.

To follow, not to lead; to fuifill, not to ordain the law; to carry into effect by negotiations with foreign governments the legislative will, when it has been announced, upon the great subjects of trade and revenue; not to interfere with controlling influence, not to go forward with an ambitious enterprise. That seems to the committee to be the appropriate functions of the Executive.

Holding this to be the general rule upon the subject, the committee discern nothing in the object to be attained or in the difficulties in the way of attaining which should induce a departur

If this view of the Constitution be accepted as correct, and it certainly received the approbation of a Senate of which were members Cal-houn, Crittenden, Berrien, Badger, Corwin, Dix, Hamlin, Mangum, Bell, Davis of Mississippi, Mason of Virginia, and Johnson of Maryland, then it only remains to show that the Mexican treaty in its origin and negotiation and ratification follows the precise rule laid down in this report. The Executive did not originate this treaty, but it had its origin in the House of Representatives by a provision contained in the sundry civil bill passed August 7, 1882, which appropriated the sum of $20,000 for the payment of the expenses of a commission to negotiate the very treaty under consideration. The right of Congress to enact this legislation is found in the clause of the Constitution which confides to it the regulation of commerce. The duty of the President was thus pointed out to him, and in accordance with the will of Congress he appointed the commission, and the commission negotiated the treaty now awaiting the approval of this House.

It may indeed be said that the approval of the House is not necessary for a treaty thus negotiated. I do not propose to discuss this question. It is obvious that the President and Senate either have the right, or they have not the right, to proceed without the concurrent action of the House. If they have the right, then the treaty is a law to-day. If they have not the right, then the approval of the House is necessary to give effect to the treaty. If the House should give its approval when there is no real necessity for it, it is simply an act of supererogation which can neither add to nor take away anything from the force of the treaty. But let it be observed that from the time of the Jay treaty down to the present time the approval of the House has always been sought for treaties which affect the revenue.

The question therefore would seem to be foreclosed by precedents of the highest character and as venerable as the Government itself. The discussion may have some interest for metaphysical minds, and I shall not be disposed to question the right of any gentleman to show his skill in dialectics and in splitting hairs, but to the practical mind of the country it is a foregone conclusion that the approval of commercial treaties by the House is both necessary and desirable. If in addition to its approval its origination in the House be contended for, as it has been by every eminent authority, then the treaty under consideration comes within the rule; and, so far as I know, is the first commercial treaty that ever has had its origin in the House under the clause which confides to Congress the regulation of commerce. So far as this argument goes, therefore, the distinction between the Mexican treaty and the other ordinary treaties is thoroughly well defined.

REVENUE REFORM.

Lastly, it has been objected to the recent treaties that they will interfere with the revenue to such an extent as either to compel a hasty tariff revision or to postpone it indefinitely. I think it will not be questioned by the advocates of these new treaties that the change in the provisions of law relating to sugar will cause an immediate loss of revenue amounting to nearly $30,000,000. Moreover when it is objected to the Spanish treaty that it will transfer twenty-five or thirty millions of dollars from the Treasury of the United States to the treasury of Spain, the answer is given that the other treaties now under negotiation will make the supply of free sugar so large that the price will be reduced by the whole amount of duty remitted. If this be true, the loss of revenue will be fully $50,000,000. If the Nicaragua treaty should be ratified, there will be an additional demand upon the treasury for $4,000,000 to be loaned to Nicaragua, and for all the expense required for the construction of the canal. I think therefore it may be safely asserted that these treaties will seriously embarrass the revenue policy of the next administration.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his recent report estimates that the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, will show a surplus of about $39,000,-000, and about the same amount for the year ending June 30, 1886. But this surplus is subject to large reductions by proposed expenditures for the creation of a new navy, and the falling off in the receipts from customs has already made a serious inroad upon the estimated surplus. One of the best authorities on the subject of our finances, Mr. David A. Wells, has recently published a statement showing that there will be an available surplus of more than $11,000,000 for the year ending 1885-'86. The ratification of the proposed treaties therefore would leave a deficiency, according to the Secretary's estimates, of more than $10,000,000, and according to that of Mr. Wells and of other judicious financiers of more than $40,000,000. This result is certainly not the entertainment to which the new administration was invited when it was pledged by the Chicago platform to reduce the surplus and relieve the people from taxation.

The former result will indeed have been achieved by the loss of the duties upon sugar, but the question as to where the reduction ought to be made, whether upon food or clothing or the tools of trade and commerce, will be foreclosed, so that the very first act of the new administration would be, necessarily, to borrow money in order to meet the obligations of the Government. For one I am not prepared thus to embarrass the new administration. The consequences, internal and external, would be of the most serious character. The first session of the next Congress would be the scene of contention as to the means of carrying on the Government, in which all reasonable and judicious measures looking to the relief of raw materials from duty necessary in order to get any advantage out of the proposed treaties would be rendered impossible. We should thus lose all the valuable fruits of our negotiations, and will have substituted for a condition of comparative financial ease one of distress and embarrassment, which would only intensify the depression of business and the sufferings of the people.

But to this obvious objection the Mexican treaty is not open. Its ratification will reduce the revenue of the United States as estimated by the Bureau of Statistics by the sum of $89,658.59. The treaty therefore will not practically interfere with the current revenues of the country, and is thus entirely relieved from what would seem to be a fatal objection to the present ratification of the other treaties. To show in convenient form the comparative concessions conceded by the two countries in the treaty under discussion I give the follow-

WARNER P. SUTTON, Consul-General,

UNITED STATES CONSULATE-GENERAL,
Matamoras, August 11, 1893.

THE MEXICAN TREATY FREE FROM OBJECTION.

The Mexican treaty, therefore, being relieved from all the objections which have been urged against the more recent treaties, is not to be judged by the considerations applicable to them, but is to stand upon its own merits, and to be approved or rejected upon the sole considera-tion as to whether it is advantageous or not to this country when considered in its details and with reference to the larger issues which it presents, looking to the development of trade and more intimate rela-tions between the two sister republics of the North American continent. Let us consider, then, the main objections which have been made against this treaty. So far as I may be able to ascertain, they may be summed up under four heads:

First. The theoretical objection that commercial treaties can not be defended on sound economical doctrines. In other words, that there should be no commercial treaties whatever between this country and other countries

Second. That the growth of sugar in this country will be interfered Third. That the provisions of the treaty will work injury to the tobacco interest Fourth. That the treaty does not secure free admission for our cotton fabrics into Mexico.

JEFFERSON'S VIEWS.

Let us consider these objections in order. I concede the theoretical objection to commercial treaties. It has nowhere been better stated than by Jefferson in his great report, made in 1793, upon the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign coun-After enumerating these restrictions he says:

tries. After enumerating these restrictions he says:

The question is in what way they may best be removed, modified, or counteracted. As to commerce, two methods occur: First, by friendly arrangements with the several nations with whom these restrictions exist; or, second, by the separate act of our own Legislatures for countervailing their effects.

There can be no doubt but that, of these two, friendly arrangement is the most eligible. Instead of embarrassing commerce under piles of regulating laws, duties, and prohibitions, could it be relieved from all its shackles in all parts of the world, could every country be employed in producing that which nature has best fitted it to produce, and each be free to exchange with others mutual surpluses for mutual wants, the greatest mass possible would then be produced of those things which contribute to human life and human happiness, the numbers of mankind-would be increased, and their condition bettered.

Would even a single nation begin with the United States this system of free commerce, it would be advisable to begin it with that nation, since it is one by one only that it can be extended to all. Where the circumstances of either party render it expedient to levy a revenue, by way of impost, on commerce, its freedom might be modified in that particular by mutual and equivalent measures, preserving it entire in all others.

It is impossible in language to give a clearer expression to the policy of universal free trade, which Jefferson saw was hopeless in his day, as it is hopeless in this. He therefore comes down to the policy of commercial treaties looking to reciprocal free trade between such nations as would join with us in making the necessary arrangements. In other words, he regarded commercial treaties as the initial step toward wider freedom of commerce. So far from condemning commercial treaties he advocates them, but always with the object of arriving at freedom and not at restriction. In other words, commercial treaties which remove obstructions to trade and break down barriers to commerce are to be sought for, but commercial treaties looking to the crea tion of new obstacles, or of special advantages in favor of the nations entering upon them, are to be reprobated.

In this respect the treaty under consideration conforms to the theoretical principles laid down by Jefferson, and I may add concurred in by all the advocates of free trade throughout the world. Even Cobden negotiated the French commercial treaty, and I take it that no one will question his devotion to theoretical principles. The fundamental confidition in such treaties is that no advantage shall be sought after by either of the nations entering into such engagements which are not freely effected to all the world if other retires advanced to reall the residual to the residual treatment of the nations. freely offered to all the world, if other nations are disposed to make the same engagements. The Mexican treaty fulfills this theoretical condition. So far as it provides for exchanges it makes no attempt to provide for a scale of duties, but the articles listed are made absolutely free as between two countries. The range of these articles is indeed narrow. I wish that it could have been extended so as to include all the productions of both countries, but so far as it goes it is a step in the right direction, which will inevitably lead to the further liberation of commerce between the two republics.

merce between the two republics.

In another respect it is admirable. It does not seek to confine these privileges to the United States and Mexico. Both the contracting parties are left free to make similar arrangements with other countries, and it is a matter of congratulation that Mexico has already entered into similar arrangements with Germany and England. It is idle to expect that we can make sharp bargains by which we are to monopolize the commerce of any of our sister republics. Such bargains would fail, because they would be one-sided. We can not expect our neighbors to grant a monopoly of trade which will be profitable to us and costly to them. We can hope, however, to begin a system of free exchanges for our respective products which will be profitable to both, and thus perhaps lay the foundations, as Jefferson hoped to do, of a system by which free trade will spread over the universe, subject only to such taxation as may be necessary for the support of government. necessary for the support of government.

POLICY OF JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,

Let it not be supposed that this policy is a new one, or that it has been forgotten from the time of Jefferson to the present day. When the Spanish colonies threw off the yoke of the mother country Monroe was President and Adams was Secretary of State. Their first act, after the recognition of the revolting colonies, was to send a minister to the new governments charged with the duty of negotiating treaties of commerce and navigation with the new republics. Mr. Adams prepared an elab-orate letter of instructions for the guidance of Mr. Anderson, in which the fundamental principle laid down was, that treaties of commerce and navigation should be "founded upon the basis of reciprocal utility and perfect equality." The language of Mr. Adams is so forcible and complete in stating the policy of this country that I deem it best to give complete in stating the policy of this country that I deem it best to give it in full:

The only object which we shall have much at heart in the negotiation will be the sanction by solemn compact of the broad and liberal principles of independence, equal favors, reciprocity. With this view I recommend to your particular attention the preamble and first four articles of the first treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and France, concluded on the 6th of February, 1778. The preamble is believed to be the first instance on the diplomatic record of nations upon which the true principles of all fair commercial negotiation between independent states were laid down and proclaimed to the world. That preamble was to the foundation of our commercial intercourse with the rest of mankind what the Declaration of Independence was to that of our internal Government.

The two instruments were parts of one and the same system, matured by long and anxious deliberation of the founders of this Union in the ever-memorable Congress of 1776; and as the Declaration of Independence was the fountain of all our municipal institutions, the preamble to the treaty with France laid the corner-stone for all our subsequent transactions of intercourse with foreign nations. Its principles should be, therefore, deeply impressed upon the mind of every statesman and negotiator of this Union, and the first four articles of the treaty with France contain the 'practical exposition of those principles which may serve as models for insertion in the projected treaty, or in any other that we may hereafter negotiate with any of the risfing republics of the south.

There is indeed a principle of still more expansive liberality which may be assumed as the busis of commercial intercourse between nation and nation. It is that of placing the foreigner, in regard to all objects of navigation and commerce, upon a footing of equal favor with the native citizen, and to that end of abolishing all discriminating duties and charges whatsoever. This pri

Mr. Clay, who succeeded Mr. Adams as Secretary of State, quotes the same instructions in his letter to Mr. Poinsett, who was charged with the negotiation of a treaty of commerce with Mexico. Mr. Van Buren, while he was Secretary of State, gives an elaborate history of the failure of the attempt to negotiate a satisfactory treaty of commerce with Mexico, and complains bitterly of the obstacles which had been interposed by Mexico to the final completion of such a treaty. Mr. Seward, during his troubled tenure of office, put himself upon record over and over again in favor of the same policy, and Webster's views on this subject are too well known to need repetition.

COMMERCIAL UNION BETWEEN MEXICO AND THE UNITED STATES

At length a treaty, very limited indeed in its scope, but nevertheless embodying the fundamental principles thus enunciated by the greatest statesmen whom this country has produced, has been negotiated, and that, too, for the first time in our diplomatic history with any country. It proceeds upon a totally different idea from the reciprocity treaty with Canada. So far as it goes, it regards Mexico and the United States as integral parts of one commercial system. It proposes free-lists, not dutiable lists. It is an attempt to establish between the two countries the same condition of affairs that exists between the several States of the It is to be regretted that it does not go further, that its range is limited; but it is the first step, and this step is in the direction of absolute freedom of exchange. I trust that this policy will not be desolute freedom of exchange. I trust that this policy will not be departed from, that no attempts will be made to arrange dutiable lists as has been in the Spanish treaty, but that year by year we shall add to the free-list all articles subject to exchange between the countries, and thus gradually approach the time when there will be complete commercial equality between the two countries, while their political government shall be kept separate.

Aside from the general advantage of unrestricted commercial intercourse, there are between Mexico and the United States special reasons why no barrier should exist to interfere with their commerce. The two countries are the complements of each other geographically and physically. Between them they control the shores of the greatest inland sea known to the world. Together they produce almost every article known to the commerce of the world; they embrace every variety of climate; and to-day they are the great source of the precious metals which furnish the basis of the commercial transactions of the They alone represent the true idea of free government. came into existence under very dissimilar circumstances—circumstances as favorable to us as they were unfavorable to Mexico. In their respective constitutions each embodied a fundamental error.

We incorporated slavery into our system; Mexico incorporated the church into its system. Whatever we have suffered has been due to these primary errors, and it is a suggestive fact, as stated by Senator Mor-gan, that these constitutional defects were eliminated at about the same time. Slavery perished with the rebellion, and the church ended its domination with the expulsion of Maximilian. Mexico is not to be judged by the same standard as the United States. For the first time in its history it has reached a period when social and physical develop-ment is possible. It has seized upon the opportunity with marvelous avidity, and our citizens have availed themselves of the opportunity with equal alacrity. More than 2,500 miles of railway have been constructed in Mexico by the aid of American capital. The connections between the two countries are now opened and will be largely increased during the next five years. Commerce is ready to take advantage of the new opportunities for exchange. The two countries supplement each other in their productions. Mexico produces many of the raw materials which we need, and we produce the manufactured products for which a nascent civilization affords an opening market.

How shall we begin? We can not expect that the prejudices of a hundred years will disappear in a day. We can not hope that antipathies of a generation will be overcome in an hour. We can not suppose that the ignorance due to a century of oppression will develop into the civilization which is the fruit of ages of effort. That Mexico is ready to open her gates to our highways and to offer us free exchange in any commodities is as surprising as it is creditable to her intelligence. That we should hesitate to take advantage of this enlargement of the area of freedom and of this new field for the exercise of our energies and the disposition of our products is simply to declare ourselves guilty of the stupidity and prejudices which we have been in the habit of charging upon others. I do not contemplate the possibility of such a result, but it would justly bring down upon us the ridicule of the civilized world.

LOUISIANA AND SUGAR

And yet we are told that the treaty should be rejected because the sugar interest in Louisiana will be disastrously affected. I confess to considerable hesitation in dealing with this objection. Louisiana is a State in this Union very dear to the American heart. She perpetuates the memory of the wisest transaction in our history, in itself an answer to all criticisms upon the extent of the treaty-making power of the President and the Senate. Louisiana is a State which has suffered much, and the Democratic heart has gone out to her in many ways in love and sympathy. When she has been flooded we have not hesitated to open the Treasury to her relief. We are now engaged in an expenditure which will run up into the hundreds of millions of dollars for her protection against the ravages of the great river of the West. We have recently advanced from the Treasury of the United States a large sum of money to enable her to inaugurate an exhibition which is regarded as international, and in which Mexico, as chiefest of our neighbors, has been invited to take part.

To this invitation Mexico has responded with a liberality out of all proportion to her present means. We learn from the newspapers that proportion to her present means. We learn from the newspapers that the Mexican exhibits and the Mexican buildings and the Mexican band are the main attractions of the exhibition; and when the Repre-sentatives and the Senators of Louisiana asked us to come to her help, the principal argument which they offered was the enlargement of our the principal argument which they offered was the enlargement of our business transactions and relations with the neighboring countries of Mexico and the South American republics. And now, when for the first time the door is opened for such transactions, Louisiana stands and forbids the bans. Upon what grounds does this protest rest? Surely not upon the ground that Mexico produces to-day even sugar enough for her own consumption. Surely not upon the ground that we are importing from Mexico any sugar which can interfere with the we are importing from Mexico any sugar which can interfere with the growth of Louisiana. The whole value of our imports of sugar from that country does not exceed $25,000 per annum. Is it upon the ground of growth of future competition?

Then we are driven to consider what justification Louisiana has for asking the people of this country to shut down the gates of commerce against our neighbors in order that Louisiana may profit and her people may grow rich at the expense of the other States of this Union. For let it be understood that the consumption of sugar in the United States has now reached such an amount that its value is equal to the whole value of the wheat flour consumed by the people of this country. If the proposition were made seriously to tax the flour of the country for the benefit of any State which produces that article the absurdity of such a suggestion would be apparent. Now, Louisiana has been a sugar-producing country from the time she first came, into the Union. At one time she produced as high as 60 per cent. of the whole consumption. This production has, however, steadily diminished, until during the present year it is estimated that the production will not exceed 9.52 per cent. of the whole amount consumed.

The business is notoriously unprofitable and on the decline. Even of the small quantity now produced by Louisiana the quantity that could possibly come in from Mexico would be an inappreciable percentage, and yet Louisiana is willing to play the part of the dog in the manger, and prevent the achievement of the great benefits which will come from free commercial relations with Mexico, although no measurable damage can by any possibility be done to her by the provisions of this treaty. Let us contrast the position of her Representatives with that of her eloquent Senator, who in 1879 uttered the following lan-Let us contrast the position of her Representatives with guage on this floor:

guage on this floor:

The highest statesmanship is that which brings the nations of the earth into a closer and a more intimate friendly communication, which shall enable the people of our country to exchange the products of their labor with the least possible expense and delay for the commodities of other nations. Exchange is wealth, but there are political as well as economical considerations that should induce us to seek a close alliance with the people of Mexico. They are our neighbors. They constitute a sister republic. We can not remain indifferent or disinterested spectators of their fortunes or of the destiny of the 9,000,000 people whose possessions adjoin our borders for more than 2,000 miles.

I respectfully suggest that the Representatives of Louisiana on this floor shall adjust the account with the representative of Louisiana in the Senate.

In response to his eloquent appeal the House passed the following joint resolution, which received the votes of a large majority of the Representatives of the Southern States:

Joint resolution providing for a treaty with the Republic of Mexico.

Representatives of the Southern States:

Joint resolution providing for a treaty with the Republic of Mexico.

Whereas it is the desire and wish of the Government and people of the United States of America to maintain the most amicable relations with the Republic of Mexico, as exemplified and set forth by the twenty-first and twenty-second articles of the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, of February 2, 1848, and reaffirmed by article 7 of the Gadsden treaty of December 30, 1853; and

Whereas it is believed to be manifestly to the interests of the peoples of both Governments to extend and increase, by all proper means, the exchange of products, and to facilitate and foster the most liberal commercial relations between the peoples of the two Governments; and

Whereas many citizens of the United States have invested their capital, and others are desirous of investing, in the Republic of Mexico, in mining, the construction of railroads, banking, farming, stock-raising, and merchandising, and in other enterprises, and in this view, with the purpose of increasing said investments, which are believed to be mutually beneficial to the peoples of both Governments, a treaty is deemed necessary; and

Whereas the territory known as the "Free Zone," on the Mexicarl border, has been the source from which violations of treaty stipulations, avoidance of tariff duties, and other irregularities have proceeded, and to maintain proper commercial and friendly relations between the two countries his Free Zone, or "Zona Libre," should be abolished; and

Whereas the present extradition treaty between the two countries has proved inadequate for the purposes for which it was made and entered into, and, with a view to the prompt rendition and punishment of fugitives from justice, further and more stringent treaty stipulations in this regard are necessary; and

Whereas clizens of either government residing in the other should be exempted from forced loans and illegal and onerous taxation or exactions: Therefore,

THE NEW SOUTH.

That objection to this treaty should come from the South is a marvel which can only be explained by ignorance of the resources for industrial activity with which that portion of the Union is endowed. The proximity of iron and coal along the great valley which skirts the Appalachian range from Virginia to Alabama will make that region in the lachian range from Virginia to Alabama will make that region in the future, when America shall be as densely populated as Europe now is, what England is to the commerce of the world. The concentration of capital and industry in the Gulf States will be the wonder of the world. The vast plateau of Mexico will be the reservoir into which their products will be poured, and he is the wisest statesman and the truest friend of the South, ravaged and destroyed as it has been by the fierce tide of war, who recognizes its destiny and makes provision in season for the markets which she will need when her industry reaches its normal development. Already the work is begun. Last year 1 865 new mal development. Already the work is begun. Last year 1,865 new industrial establishments were founded in the South, withan aggregate capital of over $100,000,000; and yet last year was a time of general depression. But the ability of the South to grow and prosper when other sections of the land were forced to contract industrial operations has demonstrated her ability to compete with the world, if she can get access to the markets which are watered by the same seas as wash the shores of the Gulf of Mexico.

The steam-power of Great Britain is about one-third of the total power of the world employed in industrial pursuits. To-day the single state of Alabama is in advance of the productive power of Great Britain at the time when this Union was formed ninety-six years ago. In less than one hundred years the South will not only show a development equal to that of Great Britain, but with wise legislation she will produce more coal and iron, spin more cotton, wool, and silk, and compete successfully with the great mistress of commerce in the open market of the world. And yet there are gentlemen who oppose the initial steps necessary to secure this great result.

TOBACCO.

Another objection is alleged that Mexico can produce tobacco in such quantities and of such qualities as will interfere seriously with the tobacco interest of the United States. Among my constituents are the largest consumers and manufacturers of tobacco in the United States. Their interest in this question induced me to ask the question of the leading house as to the effect of the treaty upon our interest in this regard. The answer which I have received I shall give in full, as being conclusive upon this point, and made under circumstances so unusual, and showing such an intelligent desire to get at the truth, that I think it may be said to dispose of the whole objection, and to show conclusively that we have nothing to fear, so far as our tobacco is concerned, from the competition with Mexico.

New York, December 12, 1884.

Dear Sir: Your valued favor of 5th instant received.
In answer to the question whether the "free importation of Mexican tobacco," I would say that two years ago, when the Mexican treaty was under consideration, and with the knowledge that under it Mexican tobacco would be admitted free into the United States. I made a trip in the interest of my firm to Mexico, and employed a gentleman to accompany me who had previously been engaged in the tobacco business in that country and a long resident of the same and thoroughly familiar with all the things pertaining to the subject.

After a careful investigation of the various tobaccos the product of Mexico, and entobacco in the United States.

That in point of excellency and its usefulness it will not compare favorably with the tobaccos in the United States.

In its general character, the better portions of it resembled somewhat the tobaccos formerly raised in the State of Florida in appearance, which, like the Mexican tobacco, resembled in appearance the very inferior tobaccos grown on the island of Cuba, and the aroma from which a cigar derived its excellency is entirely wanting in the Mexican tobacco, and the value claimed for it about probably not more than 25 per cent. of all the tobacco raised is fit for cigar purposes, in the general sense of the term.

The prices which ruled for the better portion was based upon the use that could be made of it in Mexico, which could scarcely be called legitimate. I made it my business to examine carefully into the manufacturing of cigars at Vera Cruz, which is the headquarters, and found that all the factories, without as ingle exception, were engaged in a close imitation of the Havana brands and styles, and thanks to the imported stamp which our dovernment thinks it wise to put production in the United States.

The process is a very simple one. The "Alexandre" is teamers that leave to COTTON MANUFACTURES.

The last objection urged against the treaty is that it does not admit ir cotton goods to free entry into Mexico. This is a complaint that our cotton goods to free entry into Mexico. This is a complaint that ought not to be made by those who believe in the protective doctrine, ought not to be made by those who believe in the protective doctrine, but it may properly come from the advocates of free trade. I have already said that the treaty is open to the criticism of not having range enough, and that it can only be defended in that it is good as far as it goes. I wish it had gone further. The Mexican people clothe themselves in cotton goods. As yet they are largely home-made, but there are many cotton factories in Mexico. We are to-day exporters of cotton to that country. Our cotton goes in free, and if we do not sell the goods, as we would be glad to do, we do at least sell the raw material. If the latter had been made free, the Mexican cotton factories would have been

In the Democratic platform we lay down the distinct doctrine that changes in the tariff which we hope to make should be regardful of existing interests. Surely it does not lie in our mouths to criticise Mexico for taking reasonable care of interests which have been built up by protective duties. But on what theory shall we refuse to accept acknowledged benefits in the free introduction of many of our manufactures into Mexico because we can not get free admission for all? Progress is not revolution. So long as we get an entering-wedge we ought to be satisfied, and trust to the demonstration which even the restricted free exchanges we are able to make will furnish that a larger area of commercial freedom will be desirable to both countries.

THE PROSPECTS OF GROWTH.

Having thus disposed of the objections which have been urged to the ratification of this treaty, we naturally come to the consideration of the advantages which the two countries may hope to derive from the increased facilities for intercourse made possible by this convention. The trade of Mexico is not at present very large. The total value of its exports and imports for the year 1884 was about $92,000,000, but the share of this business which came to the United States amounted to about $22,000,000, not quite one-fourth of the whole amount. The division of this trade, which shows that we sold $12,700,000 to Mexico and took from her about $9,000,000, is very favorable to the United States. What is remarkable is the rapid increase of sales since the railways were begun, without any material change in the amount of imports from Mexico during the same period.

In 1880 we sold Mexico $7,800,000 worth of goods, and purchased $7,200,000 worth; and in 1881 we sold Mexico $11,000,000, and purchased $8,000,000; in 1882 we sold Mexico $15,500,000 and purchased $8,500,000; in 1883 we sold Mexico $16,500,000 and purchased $8,500,000; in 1884 we appear to have sold Mexico a little under $13,000,000 and to have purchased $9,000,000, the temporary falling off in sales being due probably to the withholding of orders in anticipation of the restly under consideration. A comparison of these ratification of the treaty under consideration. A comparison of these figures with the business done with the South American republics serves to prove that limited as our commercial operations are with Mexico, they nevertheless equal the sales of goods to Cuba and exceed the sales to any other of the Spanish-American nations, and the trade has the great merit, not shared in by these nations, that we sell to Mexico more than we buy. It is therefore a business to be cultivated.

As to its future growth it is difficult to assign limits, but I think it may be predicted that the same results which have followed the introduction of miles in the same results which have followed the introduction of miles in the same results which have followed the introduction of miles in the same results which have followed the introduction.

duction of railways in other countries will come to pass in Mexico. has been found that the effect of railways in Europe and the United States has been to increase the volume of business fivefold in the course of fifty years, and the ratio of increase is an accelerating one. If the same rule shall hold good in Mexico, the business of that country would amount to $500,000,000 at the expiration of half a century, of which the United States would undoubtedly control more than one-half and probably two-thirds. That this expectation is not unreasonable will be evident from the fact that the foreign commerce of Italy, whose territorial area is only one-sixth that of Mexico, now amounts to over $500,000,000 per annum. The natural advantages of Mexico, with reference to the Gulf of Mexico and its own resources in the way of reference to the Gulf of Mexico and its own resources in the way of precious metals and in its admirable climate, certainly give it prospects of growth never possessed by Italy even in its palmiest days.

I am aware that a large portion of the population of Mexico is composed of Indians, who are not yet consumers of luxuries, and who do not require the appliances of a high state of civilization; but the Indians of Mexico are peculiar, in the fact that they are patient, industrious, temperate, and, with proper social order, economical and saving. The blood of this race runs in the veins of men who have contributed most for its recent product as the great revolutionary leader. More most to its regeneration—such as the great revolutionary leader Morelos, and the patriot Juarez, who overthrew Maximilian and restored the liberty of his country. The capacity of this race for social and industrial development can not be doubted, and it is but a reasonable deduction from the high civilization which it had achieved before the invasion of Cortez and the orderly government which it had created and maintained, that under the favorable conditions now secured the Aztec race will rapidly develop in all the elements of modern social and intellectual life.

In fact, more evidence of possible development is furnished to-day in Mexico than existed in England five hundred years ago. Now that the sunlight of civilization is beginning to dawn upon her magnificent territory, and that the blessings of social order are for the first time possible of achievement, and that communication with an inventive, progressive, and commercial people is made easy, we may reasonably anticipate a very healthful and rapid progress in all directions, and a growth of wealth equal if not greater than that which the last half century has produced in this country.

Up to this time, curiously enough, Mexico has suffered from the same evil which made the confederation of our States a failure. The right to impose duties on interstate commerce, although forbidden by the constitution of 1857, has been exercised up to the present time. only within the last month, since the accession of Diaz, that this evil has been abolished. The treaty under consideration stipulates for the abolition of these dues as to the articles covered by the treaty itself, and to that extent the gain to our commerce would have been considerable. But the total abolition, which has since been secured, will make it possible for unrestricted commerce in all articles to be carried on between our territory and every portion of Mexico. Our own experience of the rapid development of the internal commerce of this country after the adoption of the Constitution will serve to indicate the beneficent results in the large extension of trade which must inevitably and rapidly follow this great reform.

EUROPEAN COLONIAL POLICY.

But unless we take every opportunity to cement our relations with Mexico, and to remove as rapidly as possible the barriers which interfere with our commerce, we are in danger of losing all the fruits of the enormous expenditure of capital which has made this commerce with Mexico possible. Heretofore England and Germany have supplied the greater portion of the goods required for Mexican consumption, and the business of that country is very largely in the hands of the citizens of those two countries. Now, it will not escape notice that there has broken out, all of a sudden, a great and even bitter rivalry between England and Germany for the establishment and control of colonial possessions in the eastern hemisphere.

The policy of Germany has been boldly announced by Bismarck.

Annexation of new territory in Africa and New Guinea has already been made, and both England and Germany are evidently determined to monopolize, so far as they can, the foreign commerce of the world. But among the possibilities of future growth there is not to-day on the habitable globe an opportunity which presents so many attractions as that which Mexico offers in her new birth, in her natural resources, in her productions, and in the inevitable growth of population which must follow the introduction of new lines of railway communication. Who can doubt that England and Germany will be ready to compete for this great prize, and any neglect on our part to take advantage of our superior position and of the opening of these new avenues of trade will only result in turning over to our commercial rivals the business which we have rejected?

The prize would have been seized long since, and indeed it was attempted to be seized when Maximilian came to Mexico, but for one consideration. The Monroe doctrine, announced in 1823 and affirmed and sideration. reaffirmed by every statesman and by every Congress that has had to deal with the question, has been a standing warning to the nations of Europe to keep their hands off from the American continent. Hereto-fore no occasion has arisen, except the invasion of Mexico by Maximilian at a time when we were powerless, which required us to put this doctrine in force. Even in that time of our trouble we were concerned only with the political phase of the Monroe doctrine, which had laid down the principle that the European system of government should not be re-established upon this continent. Fortunately for us, Mexico was able out of its own patriotism and glorious spirit of heroic sacrifice to protect its independence against the designs of foreign powers and to relieve us from the inevitable conflict which must have followed the close of our war of the rebellion if the empire of Maximilian had not come to a disastrous end. But the doctrine still survives, and the events of the time warn us that we may have to put it into practical execution at all hazards and at every sacrifice.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

It may indeed happen that this very treaty will present the issue which will require us to assert that phase of the Monroe doctrine which in our day has attracted little or no attention, but which when the doctrine was announced was by far the more important element in its constitution. We are accustomed to regard this doctrine as purely political, and intended to protect the North and South American continents from the establishment of European political jurisdictions within their limits. Monroe declared that-

The political system of the allied powers-

Meaning the Holy Alliance-

Meaning the Holy Alliance—
essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective governments; and to the defense of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere, but with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

Further on he says:

It is impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness. Nor can any one believe that our Southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, we should behold such interposition in any form with indifference. If we look to the comparative strength and resources of Spain and those new governments and their distance from each other, it must be obvious that we shall never subdue them. It is still the true policy of the United States to leave the parties to themselves in the hope that other powers will pursue the same course.

Now, it is obvious that this declaration related distinctly to the reported determination of the Holy Alliance to restore the revolted colonies of Spain and Portugal to their former dependent condition. There is not even a declaration that the United States will actively interfere to prevent the attempt, if made, but the allied powers are warned that any such attempt will be regarded as a manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States. The attempt was not made, and hence the issue was never presented as to whether the United States would at that period have actively interfered with force of arms to assist the revolted colonies which had established independent governments. But when these republics proposed to hold a congress at Panama to consider measures looking to their mutual protection, John Quincy Adams, who was the Secretary of State under Monroe, and is now well known to have written that portion of Monroe's message which will give immortality to his name, had become President of the United States, and in the exercise of his constitutional power had appointed delegates to the Panama congress.

In his message to the Fanaha congress.

In his message to the Senate giving the reasons for this appointment, he clearly defines what was meant by the political portion of the Monroe doctrine as quoted above. He states that one of the objects to be attained at the congress would be:

An agreement between all parties represented at the meeting that each will guard by its own means against the establishment of any future European colony within its borders may be found advisable. This was more than two years since announced by my predecessor to the world as a principle resulting from the emancipation of both the American continents. It may be so developed to the new southern nations that they may feel it as an essential appanage to their independence.

On this subject Mr. Benton says:

The circumstances of the communication render it incredible that Mr. Adams could be deceived in his understanding, and according to him this Monroe doctrine (according to which it has been of late believed that the United States were to stand guard over the two Americas and repulse all intrusive colonies from their shores) was entirely confined to our own borders; that it was only proposed to get the other States of the New World to agree that, each for itself and by its own means, should guard its own territories. And secondly, that the United States, so far from extending gratuitous protection to the territories of other states, would neither give nor receive aid in any such enterprise, but that each should use its own means within its own borders for its own exemption from European colonial intrusion.

It will thus be seen that the political portion of the Monroe doctrine is confined to very narrow limits, and does not commit this country, unless of its own free will, to interfere even if an attempt shall be made on the part of any European power to overthrow the independence of any American government. But there still remains the warning that such an attempt would be regarded as a manifestation of an unfriendly such an attempt would be regarded as a mannestation of an unfriently spirit to the United States, and this warning we certainly ought to be as ready to renew to-day, when we are the richest and most powerful nation in the world, as we were to give it when we were comparatively feeble and without the ability to enforce our declarations.

THE ESSENCE OF THE MONROE DOCTRINE IS COMMERCIAL,

But this portion of the Monroe doctrine was then, as it is now, of minor consequence compared with the declaration contained in another portion of the message, where it is asserted "as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as a subject for future colonization by any European powers." This declaration may be called the commercial portion of the Monroe doctrine and contains its real essence. It had reference to a condition of affairs which happily has now passed away, but which constituted the great trial and grievance of the early political life of this Government. This system grew out of the navigation acts of Great Britain, and of the peculiar policy of the Spanish and Portuguese Governments, by which the colonies of each were only permitted to trade with the mother countries respectively.

After we had achieved our independence we found ourselves without the right to trade with the colonies of Great Britain, except upon sufferance. The trade which had existed between the West Indies and the American colonies prior to the war of the Revolution was large and important, but as soon as we became an independent power we found ourselves subjected to all the limitations which applied to other sovereignties. The situation became intolerable; and what was known as the colonial system was so odious that from 1789 until 1825 the history of our Government is a perpetual struggle to emancipate its commerce from the fetters of the colonial system of other countries. It is the one grievance in regard to which all our statesmen of all parties agreed. It was the great object of our diplomacy to secure the right to trade with all the world and the establishment of the principle that free Ships make free goods.

During the administration of Monroe, and that of Adams which followed, our relations with Great Britain, who had permitted us by orders in council to enjoy the West India trade, were greatly strained by the revocation of these orders and by the ruin which was thus brought upon our mercantile interests. Hence, the thing uppermost in the minds of our statesmen was that the nations of the American continent should be free for commerce not only with each other but with all the world. And this explains how it came to pass that European colonization on the American continents was an idea absolutely offensive to our statesmen, and finally led to the declaration that it would not henceforth be tolerated. This is clearly set forth by Mr. Adams in the following extract from the exposition of his motives for approving the Panama

The late President of the United States, in his message to Congress of the 2d December, 1823, while announcing the negotiation then pending with Russia relating to the Northwest coast of this continent, observed, that the occasion of the discussions to which that incident had given rise had been taken for asserting as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States were involved, that the American continent by the free and independent condition which they had assumed and maintained, were thenceforward not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power. The principle had first been assumed in that negotiation with Russia. It rested upon a course of reasoning equally simple and conclusive.

With the exception of the existing European colonies, which it was in no wise intended to disturb, the two continents consisted of several sovereign and independent nations, whose territories covered their whole surface. By this their independent condition, the United States enjoyed the right of commercial intercourse with every part of their possessions. To attempt the establishment of a colony in those possessions would be to usurp, to the exclusion of others, a commercial intercourse which was the common possession of all. It could not be done without encroaching upon existing rights of the United States. The Government of Russia has never disputed these positions, nor manifested the slightest dissatisfaction at their having been taken. Most of the new American republics have declared their having been taken. Most of the now American republics have declared their entire assent to them; and they now propose, among the subjects of consultation at Panama, to take into consideration the means of making effectual the assertion of that principle, as well as the means of resisting interference from abroad with the domestic concerns of the American governments.

If any European power were to-day to attempt a system of coloniza-

If any European power were to-day to attempt a system of colonization upon this continent, as they are attempting it in Africa, I take it that this Government would insist upon the doctrines here laid down, and would resist the attempt even at the cannon's mouth.

But it is quite possible that an independent country, preserving its political autonomy, may, as a matter of fact, occupy the position of a colony so far as its trade and commerce are concerned. If we reject the Mexican treaty we practically reject the Monroe doctrine, by turning that country, with its great resources and possibilities of infinite development, over to England and Germany.

opment, over to England and Germany.

It is perfectly competent for the three governments to make treaties by which the trade of Mexico shall be practically restricted and the United States excluded from all participation therein. Nor could we complain of such an exclusion if the proffer now made for larger commercial relations in the best possible form of free-lists, of reciprocal advantage, shall be rejected. In that event we shall see restored, as to our nearest and most important neighbor, all the evils of the colonial system, against which the Monroe doctrine was mainly directed. The evils of this system are still felt in our relations with Cuba, which has been brought to ruin by the continuance of the colonial system in limiting,

The Spanish treaty is an attempt to alleviate these evils, and our Government has been prepared to make great sacrifices in order that we may have a chance to sell our products to the island from which we buy so large a portion of our sugar. Let us look to it then that while we are striving to get rid of the evils of the colonial system so far as Cuba is concerned, we do not cause it to be re-established in Mexico, to become the fruitful source of contention and finally of open war, not only with Mexico but with her European allies, who have grasped the profits of her opening trade. If, then, we really believe in the Monroe doctrine, and are willing to act upon the experience and principles which gave it birth, we are bound to give our assent to the pending treaty.

HIGH WAGES AND CHEAP GOODS,

But it will be said that the assertion of the Monroe doctrine, and its recognition in this legislation, will not, and ought not, to give us the trade with Mexico, if we can be undersold by Great Britain and France and Germany. It is quite certain that most of the articles consumed and Germany. It is quite certain that most of the articles consumed by Mexico are more cheaply made and sold at a less price by our European rivals than we have been heretofore able to supply them. The opening of railway communication with Mexico will to some extent counterbalance this advantage, but we shall still be at a disadvantage in many kinds of business by reason of the higher prices of our goods; and hence we shall not be able to get the benefits anticipated from the establishment of more liberal principles of trade. This raises the question why our goods are dearer than those of our neighbors. We are told that these goods are produced abroad at a lower rate of wares.

question why our goods are dearer than those of our neighbors. We are told that these goods are produced abroad at a lower rate of wages than prevails in this country, and hence the products of human industry must be dearer here than in Europe.

This opinion is based upon the assumption that high wages make dear goods, but the fact is that the cheapest goods are made where the rate of wages is highest. Wages in Great Britain are higher than they are in France and Germany, and yet to-day France and Germany are found protecting themselves against the high wages of England and of the United States, while in the United States we are called upon to the United States, while in the United States we are called upon to protect ourselves against the lower wages of England, France, and Germany. Here is a contradiction which I submit requires explanation from the advocates of the restrictive policy in trade. If England, with wages 58 per cent. higher than they are in France and 42 per cent. higher than they are in Germany, can undersell those countries in the open markets of the world high wages are no bar to the supply of cheap goods. If the United States, with wages 84 per cent. higher than they are in England, 205 per cent. higher than they are in France, and 162 per cent, higher than they are in Germany, can send flour, provisions, and cent. higher than they are in Germany, can send flour, provisions, and grain to Europe in competition with the lower wages of those countries and with the still lower wages of Russia and India, then high wages can be no bar to unrestricted commerce in food products. The inference is irresistible that there is no necessary connection between cheap goods and the rate of wages.

If these goods are to be sold in the open markets of the world in competition with each other, then the wages will be that portion of the result which is left after paying for the materials and the capital employed in their production. The cheaper the raw materials, therefore, the higher the wages will be; and hence nations who have cheap raw materials and who under no circumstances impose taxes upon them if they are brought from abroad, will always be able to pay higher wages than nations who have dear raw materials, or who make them dear by taxation. It may be asserted, therefore, that the high wages prevalent in the United States are simply the result of its superior natural resources; and if we would refrain from taxing those raw materials which we do not produce there is no reason why we could not compete for the commerce of Mexico, in all departments, with Great Britain and France and Germany, and still pay the higher wages which are prevalent in this country.

FREE RAW MATERIALS.

Our own wages are high because we have the most favorable conditions for production of all staple articles of any nation in the world. Wages will always be high in this country unless we voluntarily cut ourselves off from access to the open markets of the world by artificial additions to the cost of production, which we do when we put taxes upon raw materials. We have now reached a point of industrial derelopment where there is an excess of productive power, where we produce more than we can consume. When that point is reached labor must either stand idle or its wages be reduced until our goods can compete with the cheaper goods of other nations. The excess must find foreign markets, and if we continue to tax raw materials the amount of tax must be deducted from the fund to be paid for wages. Hence the first step toward a larger commerce must be in the reduction of duties on raw materials.

This step is taken in the Mexican treaty. We shall at least get hemp and many other fibers, which are now heavily taxed, free of all duty; and, if this step be followed up by enlarging the free-list until all raw materials are made free, then we shall be prepared to go into the open markets of the world with our surplus products and sell them in competition with other nations, and bring back home an adequate return for the labor which is employed in their production. These steps once taken, progress toward freer trade will be rapid. Nulla vestigia retrorsum.

Such, stated as fully as the brief limits of debate under the rules will permit, are the reasons why the House should give its approval to the treaty with Mexico, made in accordance with its own initiatory action. Whether regarded from the narrow view of present selfish interest or from the broader aspect of future progress and development; whether looked at as a matter of pure business or from the standpoint of enlight-ened statesmanship, which ought to govern this great Republic in its intercourse and relations with the sister republics of the Western World, this treaty commends itself to the judgment, the conscience, and the liberality of the House as representing the intelligence and will of the people.

PRODUCTION AND DISTRIBUTION.

But these considerations, weighty as they are, and conclusive as I believe them to be, nevertheless shrink into comparative insignificance when subjected to the test of a broader view of the subject, a view which until this age of the world has never been within the range of human vision. The discoveries of science and the inventions of man, made since this country became a nation, have filled the world with wealth and created possibilities of development beyond the wildest dreams of fancy. Who can estimate the productive powers now subservient to the control of man, when all the forces of nature have been made obedient to his will? The world is not only rich in actual acquisimade obedient to his will? The world is not only rich in actual acquisitions, but the possibilities of production have far outrun the visible possibilities of consumption. And yet in an age when the average condition of the masses of mankind is on a higher plane of comfort and civilization than was dreamed of in the golden age of the poets, we are confronted with the painful fact that crowds of laborers, willing and anxious to earn their daily bread, are waiting all the day long in vain for the coveted opportunity to make an honest and honorable livelihood.

Nor is this statement true only in this country. It is true of all civilized countries, and the suffering is undoubtedly greater in proportion to the accumulated wealth of each. The world was never so rich as now, and yet never in its history was so many of its inhabitants uttering the warning cry of despair, "How long, oh Lord, how long?" Can it be that the discoveries of science, the development and application of physicial force, the increase of wealth, the progress of civilization, mean after all only the degradation of humanity and condemnation of great bodies of men to hopeless bondage and unutterable woe? The mere suggestion of such a result is a libel on the intelligence of man and a reproach to the goodness of Divine Providence.

There must be a better order. How to reach that order is the problem presented to the ingenuity, the intelligence, and the conscience of the age in which we live. Let us define the nature of the problem. the age in which we live. Let us define the nature of the problem. The world is rich, and properly distributed there is enough to insure comfort to every human being who does not voluntarily forfeit the right to the blessings of existence. The power to increase riches is so developed that production is actually forced into suspension all over the world, because its fruits can not be distributed. And yet this stoppage of production only increases the number of idle hands and empty stomachs. But if all who have unsatisfied lawful desires were supplied there would be no surplus of products.

What, then, is the obvious conclusion? The machinery of distribution is plainly out of proportion to the machinery of production. The remedy thus becomes apparent. The distributing powers must be increased, and if there be any obstacles to distribution they must be recreased, and if there be any obstacles to distribution they must be removed. But the distributive agencies are already very complete, and many of them in such excess as also to be unprofitable and unemployed. Steamships are idle for want of freights and railways are running with trains only partially filled in every part of the world. There is therefore no lack of the direct means for a wider distribution of products. The difficulty, then, must be sought for in the causes which determine the use of the machinery of distribution. When we make this investigation we find in existence obstructive laws interfering with free exchange, doubtless designed to serve beneficial ends, which have long survived the useful purposes for which they were enacted. In other words, the natural exchanges between nations are forbidden by law.

Exchange of surplus commodities is therefore only made at a loss to be measured by the force of the artificial obstructions thus created, instead of the profit which each country would have derived from its superior resources for production in special directions. all cases fall upon labor, and therefore be deducted from the wages of The value of the productive power of the world has thus been diminished by the whole amount of unnecessary friction interposed by restrictive legislation. The loss thus produced is not felt until a nation reaches the stage of development in which its home market no longer suffices for the consumption of its industrial products. Then the surplus must be sold, or its labor will stand idle. This is our present case, and this is the problem with which every civilized country is now grappling. The inevitable results of domestic competition thus compet the adoption of the only possible solution of the problem. All laws which interpose artificial obstructions and create unnecessary friction must be repealed, not only in this country but throughout the world at large.

THE COMPETITION OF FREE COMMERCE BENEFICIAL.

Have we anything to dread from such a result? So far as competitive products are concerned, when commerce becomes free the survival in each branch of industry will be to the fittest. Who is the fittest in all the great staple products of commerce? The answer is that the fittest is the nation which can produce these products with the least expenditure of human labor. Now of all the countries in the world the United States is the best endowed with the natural elements of The labor devoted to its exploitation will therefore produce more value and be better rewarded than in any other country. We can, therefore, supply the world with our products on better terms than the nations who compete with us, and whatever may be the price of these products in the open markets of the world, the wages of labor in this country will always exceed the wages of labor elsewhere.

But with free commerce throughout the world, all labor will receive its natural reward without deduction from obstructive taxes and artificial friction. With unrestricted commerce, plenty will be a blessing and not a curse. Gluts of commodities will be impossible. The floods which overflow the banks of the Mississippi and the Amazon when they reach the ocean do not raise the general level to an appreciable extent. So in the vast commerce of the world, the excessive production of a single country will no longer be felt as a disturbing element, but will be a beneficent influence if it shall be found to cheapen the cost to the

These truths are beginning to dawn upon mankind, and the Mexican treaty is the first ray of actual light which has penetrated the atmosphere of error which has heretofore prevented us from taking full advantage of our unequaled resources and the opportunities for controlling the commerce of the world. By a happy chance, doubtless, the Mexican treaty strikes the keynote of the coming emancipation of the toiling masses of mankind, by providing for absolutely free exchanges within the limited range of the enumerated commodities. Let this example be continued and extended. Let us make no commercial treaties in which the principle of free exchange is not incorporated. Let us not attempt to procure special privileges from which other nations are excluded, but let every step be taken with a view to the abolition of restriction, to the opening of new markets in exchange for our own markets. This example will spread until the whole unbounded continent shall be ours for free exchange. With commerce thus liberated from its shackles, the beneficent laws of nature will assert themselves With commerce thus liberated from its shackles, the beneficent laws of nature will assert themselves in the extinction of paperism and the securing of universal comfort through the equitable distribution of the profits of industry. This beneficent result will surely be realized when no man willing to work shall be deprived by the operation of law of the opportunity to labor, and every man shall receive, as he will receive when commerce is free, "a fair day's wage for a fair day's work."

Thus will be answered the question formulated by a master-mind-a question which society must answer or disappoint the just expectations of humanity: "What are the best means consistent with equity and justice for bringing about a more equal division of the accumulated wealth of the world and a more equal division of the daily products of industry between capital and labor, so that it may become possible for all to enjoy a fair share of material comfort and intellectual culture, possible for all to lead a dignified life, and less difficult for all to lead a good

I advocate the Mexican treaty because among its other merits it contains the germ of the solution of this great problem of the ages.

Appropriations to Banks of Issue.

When earth produces, free and fair,
The golden, waving corn;
When fragrant fruits perfume the air,
And fleecy flocks are shorn;
While thousands move with aching head,
And sing this ceaseless song:
"We starve, we die; oh, give us bread!"
There must be something wrong.

When wealth is wrought as seasons roll
From off the fruitful soil;
When luxury from pole to pole
Reaps fruits of human toil;
When from a thousand, one alone
In plenty rolls along,
While others only gnaw the bone,
There must be something wrong.

And when production never ends,
The earth is yielding ever,
A copious harvest oft begins,
But distribution, never;
When toiling millions work to fill
The wealthy coffers strong;
When those are crushed who work and till,
There must be something wrong.

When poor men's tables waste away
To barrenness and drought,
There must be something in the way
That's worth the finding out;
With surfeits one great table bends,
While numbers move along,
While scarce a crust their board extends,
There must be something wrong.

Then let the law give equal right
To wealthy and to poor;
Let Justice crush the arm of might;
We ask for nothing more.
Until this system is begun
The burden of our song
Must, and can be, this only one,
There must be something wrong.

ond as the Dingley bill, and the third as the Potter refunding bill.

Of these three, in my opinion, the McPherson bill is the least objectionable; the Dingley bill the next most objectionable, and the Potter bill the very worst of all.

I desire in the commencement of my remarks to give a fair analysis of the terms of each of these three bills, and follow that by a comparison each with the other; and thereafter to show, as well as I may be able, the motives that have inspired the formulation and presentation of each of them to the House for its consideration and action, as well also the real inspiration that will prompt the efforts that may be made to secure of them to the House for its consideration and action, as well also the real inspiration that will prompt the efforts that may be made to secure the passage of the Potter bill as a substitute for the other two.

The McPherson bill in simple terms provides that the Secretary shall cause to be created and issued in blank, to be signed by the proper officials of each national-bank association desiring them, an additional volume of 10 per cent. in notes to be used as money—thus inflate the volume—at a cost to such association of less than 1 per cent. In short, where they now have under existing law ninety currency dollars on each $100 par value of the bonds deposited with the Comptroller of the Currency as security for the redemption of their circulating notes, they shall have one hundred. Should this bill be enacted into law, it would open the doors to a sudden inflation of the volume of currency notes—used as money—to the extent of from thirty-two to thirty-five millions. This additional sum would only cost the banks availing themselves of this law not to exceed 1 per cent. per annum, with the privilege to loan this law not to exceed 1 per cent. per annum, with the privilege to loan on or discount promissory notes or bills of exchange at a rate of interest varying from 5 per cent. per annum to as high a rate as unconscionable greed for money gain would permit the holder and owner of these currency dollars to take from the unfortunate borrower-the one who might need the life-blood of business enterprises and success to carry on his plans and purposes to proper development.

This bill has, under the existing circumstances of the general business

This bill has, under the existing circumstances of the general business of the country, but one redeeming feature, and that is to make it both possible and probable to immediately increase the volume of circulating bank notes used in lieu of money to the extent I have named, say thirty-two to thirty-five millions of currency dollars.

This is evidently the motive inspiring the creation and presentation of the bill now being considered. The volume of a substitute for money used as money, thus increased, would by its inevitable and irresistible influences inflate prices and produce spasmodic indications of prosperity; but only, as I view the question, at a first great cost to the people—the Government—in interest for the privilege of using them in business transactions, to be inevitably followed in course of time as the bonds held as security might appreciate in price, or surplus in the Treasury demand their withdrawal for cancellation, by a contraction of volume, and thus destruction of values, in ratio of shrinkage of the volume or number of units in circulation representing money, or indeed ume or number of units in circulation representing money, or indeed money itself. For the thing itself, as well as the representative of it, produces the same effect—results—so long as by the people, the business and labor wealth-producing classes, they are treated as money, insomuch as contraction or expansion of volume of units is concerned.

The Dingley bill provides that the sum of United States dollars

The Dingley bill provides that the sum of United States dollars (greenbacks, invidiously and inappropriately so called) now in the Treasury for the "redemption of notes of national banks" "failed," "in liquidation," and "reducing circulation," shall be taken out of the United States vaults of sacred trust for the purposes mentioned, and instead of longer being used as such sacred trust, to redeem such of the notes of national banks as have "failed," "gone into liquidation," "or may be retiring their circulation," as the sacredness of the now unrepudiated law provides they should be, that the Secretary of the Treasury purchase with this money, in the market, bonds with no limit restriction as to premium which he might pay the bondowner for his untaxed interest-accruing bond; but with the provision that these so purchased bonds should be put in the Treasury in the place and stead of the sacred trust redemption fund of United States notes, and while there, draw interest at the same rate as before, until the sum so accruthere, draw interest at the same rate as before, until the sum so accruing should equal the sum of the premium paid by the Secretary of the Treasury in the purchase of such bonds. Not only this, but to continue drawing interest at the same rate until the purchased bonds should mature for payment.

By the logic of implication, should this bill be enacted into law, as

By the logic of implication, should this bill be enacted into law, as at present framed, not only would there be no actual redemption fund under present law for the notes of national banks "failed," "in liquidation," or "reducing circulation," save and except such a part of the bonds so purchased and placed as a substitute for the present $42,837,408 (see Treasurer Wyman's report, November 29, 1884) redemption fund, should be again thrown on the market for sale and sold at such price as they might bring to yield the needed sum; leaving the naked fact that all of such bonds so purchased and placed and remaining unsold would draw interest from one section of the Treasury to another, without displacing a dollar or adding a dollar to the aggregate fund in the Treasury.

the Treasury.

Also the further naked fact, that the sum so paid for premium in the purchase of bonds under the terms of this bill would be a dead loss to the Government—the people—if for no other reason than this, that there was and is to-day (see report of Hugh McCulloch, Secretary of the Treasury, dated December 31, 1885) $194,190,500 of bonds redeemable and payable at the pleasure of the Government, drawing interest, untaxed, registered, fire-proof, burglar-proof, cyclone-proof, earthquake and volcano proof, blight, cholera and death proof; proof against winds, rains, floods, and diminution (save the people awake and so decree) ever eating, like the maw of a maelstrom; always yielding revenue, like the work of the devil; terrible as the awfully mysterious; gathering where they have neither plowed, tilled, nor sown; reaping by usury where they have no equitable rights—bonds! bonds!! bonds!!!—that by their own terms are equitable rights—bonds! bonds!!!—that by their own terms are payable at the pleasure of the Government—people; and in these same Treasury notes (greenbacks), as per the terms of a law made by Congressional enactment and executive approval March 18, 1869, which provides in express terms that the debt interest-bearing obligations of the United States may be paid in lawful money unless expressly provided that payment be made in gold or silver. The Revised Statutes of the United States, section 3588, reads as follows:

United States notes shall be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except for duties on imports and interest on the public debt.

This law has never been repealed so far as I have been informed, and there has been no law enacted that changes the law existing at the time these bonds were created and put on the market for sale. If there had been a new law—a law setting forth different terms of payment of the public debt than the section I have referred to—than also is set forth in the law of July 11, 1862, entitled "An act to authorize an additional issue of United States notes and for other purposes," being chapter 162 of the laws relating to this question (this law of 1862 provides that these notes ($150,000,000 authorized thereby) "shall be receivable in payment of all loans made to the United States, and of all taxes, internal duties, excises, debts, and demands of every kind due to the United States, except duties on imports and interest, and of all claims and demands against the United States except for interest on bonds, notes, and certificates of debt or deposit; and shall also be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except duties on imports and interest as aforesaid"), then the evidences of the previous law in the hands of the people should have been canceled by payment.

It seems to me proper at this time to call attention to another feature of this same chapter of laws (1862), found in the same section 4 which I have above quoted. It is as follows:

And any holder of United States notes depositing any sum not less than $50, or some multiple of $50, with the Treasurer of the United States or either of the assistant treasurers, shall receive in exchange therefor duplicate certificates of deposit, one of which may be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon issue to the holder an equal amount of bonds of the United States, coupon or registered, as may by said holder be desired, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years, and payable twenty years from the date thereof

I refer to this feature of the law of 1862 for the reason that the report of Hugh McCulloch, of date December 31, 1884, states as follows:

Loan of July 12, 1882, authorizing act July 12, 1882, rate 3 per cent.; when redeemable, option United States; amount outstanding, registered, $194,190,500; interest due and unpaid, $17,619.88; interest accrued, $970,952.50.

Which in truth and fact is only a continuation of the loan of 1862, and thus payable in "lawful money" (i. e., greenbacks)—United States notes. This same report of Hugh McCulloch states that there is of available cash balance in the Treasury, January 1, 1885, $140,811,929.92. If the desire to inflate the volume of dollar units in circulation is an honest one, why did not the author of this Dingley bill introduce a measure providing that this $140,811,929.92 of available surplus should be used in the cancellation of the $194,190,500 of bonds now due and payable at the option of the Government? Is it not apparent, indeed an awfully naked fact, that there is a determination to increase the volume of money units in general circulation, and thus avert the "calamity" impending and in progress as the work of the manipulators of the Republican party, to the end of striking a blow at the proposed tariff reform projects the Democrats brought up for action last session, in a way that will result in the practical continuation of the bond debt as a basis for national-bank circulation, instead of increasing such volume as the result of taking such surplus cash in the Treasury, and with it pay the option bonds, cancel the debt to that extent, and thus stop the drain of interest from the people—the producers of wealth to an untaxed bondocracy? But let me go a little further with my analysis of this Dingley bill.

These United States notes (see Treasurer Wyman's report, November 29, 1884), in the sum of $42,837,408, were placed in the Treasury 29, 1884), in the sum of $42,837,405, were placed in the Treasury under a law and in accordance with its provisions as solemn as it was ever made, as a sacred trust fund, by the banks that had "failed," "gone into liquidation," or "were retiring their circulation," as a redeemer of such notes. The redeemer note, be it remembered, was and is a legal tender for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt, but the currency notes to be redeemed under this law were not such a legal tender; indeed as between the private debtor and creditor such national-bank notes have no legaltender qualification whatsoever. Yet this Dingley bill proposes to stultify the act of Congress creating and repudiate the terms of this sacred trust; sacred as a solemn enactment of Congress; sacred as a redeemer for that to be redeemed, and in truth and fact the only redeemer under existing law except the holder be possessed of $50 or more of these United States dollars at one time and be in access to the subtreasury; sacred as a fiduciary trust between the national banks and the people, the Government being the trustee.

But another feature of this Dingley bill is that the bonds so purchased and deposited shall be, first, for the prompt redemption of out-standing (to be redeemed) national-bank notes.

How can such notes be redeemed with bonds, except the bonds so purchased and deposited be brought forth again and put on the market for sale at such price as they may bring? Then the interest the bill provides for accumulating until it shall equal the premium paid in the purchase of the bonds—what shall become of the excess, if any, that may accumulate therefrom to the time the said bonds may meture?

accumulate therefrom to the time the said bonds may mature?

The bonds so purchased must be put in the place of the "sacred trust The bonds so purchased must be put in the place of the sacred trust fund," and that fund belongs, first, to the people to redeem outstanding national-bank notes, and thereafter to those (the banks) which hypothecated the trust with the Government. In short, it seems to me that the accumulation of interest after the premium is made good will belong to the banks placing the trust. If so, then, to sum up in part, the bond-seller gets, first, the premium on sale of his bond over parthis he can loan at once; second, they get the face of the bond in United States dollars at par with gold dollars—these he can loan at once; third, they secure the suretyship of the United States Treasury for the safethey secure the surecyship of the Chitect States Treasury for the Sate-keeping of the bonds to redeem outstanding circulation, and also per-form the scavenger part, getting in the notes outstanding subject to the terms of this bill; fourth, the opportunity to make a "spec" when the Treasury might be forced to resell the bonds for United States dollars Treasury might be forced to resell the bonds for United States dollars with which to redeem the said national-bank notes; fifth, most certainly the banks, each, would be entitled to all the interest which might accumulate in excess of the premium paid and sum used in redemption; for this is positively a trust fund, to which no one has any right except the bill-holders for redemption purposes, and those who made the pledge. This would be a new banking system with the "turkey" all on one side.

The ostensible purpose was to increase the volume of money in circulation by liberating these $42,837,408 from Treasury imprisonment. The apparently real purpose, as developed by investigation, was to play a more subtle financial game of "heads I win and tails you lose" than any heretofore, whereby the rich become richer and the poor more than any heretofore, whereby the rich become richer and the poor more

On the 19th day of May, 1884, I introduced a joint resolution in words and figures following, to wit, which I have pressed to reach consideration and vote in season and out of season, because I believed the Dingley bill to be a cunningly devised scheme hidden under the plea of "more money needed," "volume too small," but with a real purpose to play millions into the hands of the bond-owners.

I now introduce as a part of my remarks the joint resolution I have referred to, and I demand that objection be made to each statement and paragraph that is declared not strictly true, as a relation of reasons, as well the wisdom of the policy invoked by the "resolution."

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 19, 1884.

Read twice, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to e printed.

Mr. Weller introduced the following joint resolution:

Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the United States Treasury to use all the unappropriated and surplus moneys in the Treasury for the redemption of United States bonds, and for other purposes.

"Whereas it is currently reported and believed that great financial and business distress exists at New York and other sections of the country; and "Whereas it is assumed that this financial and business distress is due to a marked scarcity of money to promptly meet current and matured obligations; marked scarcity of money to promptly meet current and matured obligations; and

"Whereas there are many millions of money now in the Treasury of the United States unappropriated, but subject to the order of this Congress; and
"Whereas the law of March 18, 1869, contained the following provision, to wit, 'but none of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be paid before maturity, unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin; 'and
"Whereas it is now and long time ago has been alleged that United States notes were convertible into coin at the pleasure of the holder, and also that bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than 3½ per cent. can be sold at par in coin: Therefore,
"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to use, as soon as may be, all of the surplus moneys in the Treasury for the redemption of bonds outstanding at a price not above par, and also to (so) purchase all bonds not subject to call or redemption that may be offered to the extent of moneys so available, and to received and paid for shall be canceled and destroyed, with their interest obligations."

This resolution passing both Houses and receiving Executive approval

This resolution passing both Houses and receiving Executive approval

would make a way to get into circulation all the available money in the Treasury by payment and destruction of United States interest-bearing untaxed obligations to that extent.

I will now introduce as a part of my remarks the so-called Dingley bill, as presented to the House by the gentleman from Maine [Mr.] DINGLEY] on February 18, 1884; also the reported amendments April 1, 1884, that a contrast between the bill as presented by the apparent author and the same as amended by the Committee on Banking and Currency may be seen, as also the further opportunity to contrast it with my "joint resolution" of May 19, 1884:

Mr. DINGLEY introduced the following bill:

Mr. Dingley introduced the following bill:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized, out of any lawful money deposited by national banks for the purpose of retiring their circulation, under the provisions of section 4 of the act of July 20, 1874, and of sections 522 and 5230 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and of section 6 of the act of July 12, 1882, to purchase, at current market rates, under such regulations as he may prescribe, such bonds of the United States [bearing interest at a rate in excess of 3 per centum; the bonds so purchased to be held in trust until their maturity for the payment of the circulating notes of the banks which have deposited lawful money for such payment: Provided, That the interest on such bonds so held in trust be applied first to the payment of the premiums paid for the bonds, and subsequently, with any excess of the proceeds of the bonds which may finally remain after the United States has been reimbursed for its outlay in retiring the notes, to form a fund for the redemption of the notes of such national banks as may become insolvent, and the securities of which on deposit with the United States for the redemption of their circulating notes may prove insufficient for such purpose) as in his judgment will be for the interest of the Government, the bonds so purchased, together with the interest that may accrea on the same, to be held in trust and used for the payment of the circulating notes of the banks which have deposited lawful money for such payment.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That upon a deposit of any United States bonds bearing interest, in the manner required by law, any national banking association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations, in blank, registered and countersigned as provided by law, not exceeding in amount the par value of the bonds deposited: Provided, That at no time shall the total amount of such notes issued to any such association exceed the amount at such time actually paid in of its capital stock. Bettenacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to receive at the Treasury any bonds of the United States bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum or 4½ per cent. per annum, and to issue in exchange therefor an equal amount of registered bonds of the United States of the denominations of fifty, one hundred, five hundred, one thousand, five thousand, ten thousand, and fifty thousand dollars, of such form as he may prescribe, and bearing interest at the rate of 2½ per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually at the Treasury of the United States. Said 2½ per cent. bonds to be issued in exchange for 4 per cent. bonds shall be payable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of July, 1907; said 2½ per cent. bonds to be issued in exchange for 4½ per cent. bonds shall be payable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of September, 1891.

Sec. 2. In the said exchange of 2½ per cent. bonds for 4 per cent. and 4½ per cent. bonds, provided always the moneys on hand and applicable are sufficient, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay such a sum in each case as shall be equal to the aggregate present worth of the quarter-yearly payments of interest from which the United States is released by such exchange, all interest in ascertaining said present worth being computed at the rate of 3per cent. per annum, reinvested quarter yearly.

Sec. 3. All said 2½ per cent. bonds and the interest thereon shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes and duties of the United States and from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

E. B. ELLIOTT,

Government Actuary,

United States Treasury Department.

United States Treasury Department, January 9, 1885.

Amount in money required in refunding under Potter bill:
For refunding all 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds now deposited as security for circulation, $34,388,400.
For refunding entire present capital of all national banks, $127,000,000.
For refunding entire amount of 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds now outstanding, $902,324,604.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that I present these calculations with the statement of the Government actuary as an argument irrefutable why the Potter refunding scheme should be defeated by use of any and all the rules and parliamentary practice of this House. Further on I hope to show that we, the people, the Government, have a United States Constitution which estops any one Congress to make a law that a subsequent Congress can not repeal in every of its features, independent of whatsoever act or thing by any one may have been done under the act to be repealed.

So much unfair comment has been indulged in by a few members on this floor as to the motives that inspired me to introduce to the House (by consent that I had secured) as my own measure an exact copy of this Potter refunding bill, and have the same referred to the proper committee on January 14, 1885, the day previous to the one set for the consideration of the McPherson and Dingley bill, by former action of the McPherson and Dingley bill, by former action of the House; and the further fact that I was thereafter on that day and the morning of the next so besieged by more than earnest importuni-ties to withdraw from the committee and House my "Potter" (?) re-funding bill, that I shall be excused for a brief digression to state why I so did introduce and have referred to the proper committee "a copy" of said bill as "my bill."

The House (very unwisely, I think) have a rule that no bill or joint resolution before the House for consideration or vote can be amended by offering as an amendment anything which is the substance of any other bill or joint resolution then before any committee. I, having knowledge of this rule (for it kept me from introducing some bills on questions of vital importance to the wealth producers), and being advised sufficiently well of the strategic purposes in hand that moved to the withdrawal from the committee by Mr. POTTER the Potter refunding bill (to offer it as a substitute for the McPherson and Dingley) ing bill (to offer it as a substitute for the McPherson and Dingley bills), I concluded, after being, as I thought, wisely inspired to whip the devil out of the Congressional paradise by ("strategy, my boy") introducing and having referred a copy of that same bill as my own, thus preventing it being offered as a substitute for any bill up for consideration, and thereby lay broad and deep the ("strategy, my boy") foundations for defeating the ("strategy, my boy") Potter refunding bill, and possibly also the McPherson and Dingley bills.

Mr. Speaker, why could not the author of the McPherson bill, recognizing as it did the need of a greater volume of money to assist commercial transactions and to stop the rapid diminution of market values.

mercial transactions and to stop the rapid diminution of market values, which recent contractions of volume of money and currency—and it makes no difference which, so as by comity each fills the business channels and arteries of productive forces as money—which, by the set and predetermined policy of the manipulators of the Republican party, had been set in operation, producing its inevitable results—I inquire, why could not the author of this proposed law have provided by or in it that any national bank "going into liquidation" or "retiring its circulation" should receive and by law be compelled to receive in exchange for its retiring notes secured by 100 per cent. of United States bonds 100 cents in United States full legal-tender dollars, and that the bonds so deposited as security be canceled, with their interest obligations, and forever destroyed? Had this bill finally come before the House for its action on amendments to and substitutes for the original bill, I had purposed to offer as a substitute a bill providing that each national-bank note received at the proper governmental office for re-tirement should be immediately replaced by a United States full legaltender dollar, and that an equal sum in dollar representation of the bonds held by the Treasury as security (?) for the redemption of such notes should be destroyed by final, full, and complete cancellation, with their interest obligations. Can any one present the first shadow of an argument why this should not be done?

Resumption of specie payments says that United States notes are at par with gold.

The national banks, by their friends in the Senate, say that the volume of money is too small for the business interest, and should be increased; such a measure as I propose would give them 100 cents on the dollar for their bonds in a lawful money, which is to-day the only redeemer for their notes of credit.

It would relieve the people from taxation to the extent of interest on such a sum of bonds as might thus be canceled.

It would stop contraction of volume of money or currency, and thus stop contraction of price values.

·It would stimulate business enterprises and productive forces.

It would help to stop the making of millionaires on the one hand and

But this is not the policy of the manipulators. paupers on the other. Their policy, if one may judge of the course pursued, arguments made, and acts developed, is to confine the making and control of the volume of money to the monometallic standard of gold as a basis, and national-bank notes of credit as the only money and currency with which the business of the country can or may be carried on.

The blow that has recently, as well as continuously, from 1873, been struck at the "fathers" silver dollar of 412½ grains nine-tenths fine was for the sole purpose of limiting the volume of money to such a sum in the aggregate and to the hands of such control as that price values, measured as they always are in a very large degree by volume of money in circulation, could be manipulated by a few to the detriment of the

This blow was not struck at silver until it was discovered that extraordinary productions of silver were continuously developing in the newly discovered mines of the West.

When these enormous productions were brought to light and confirmed as a fact, then the money-mongers-those that deal in money-lending, promissory notes, mortgages, bonds, stocks, and the securities (interest-bearing evidences of indebtedness) of the world (meaning personal, municipal, corporate, town, city, county, State, and national)—became alarmed, and secretly declared that such an increase to the volume of money would cause the price of labor and its products to go up in the market, while their notes, mortgages, stocks, bonds, and other securities would go down in the market.

In 1857 Germany demonetized gold at the bid of the money-mongers of the world, who had then taken alarm at the reported enormous production of gold from the recently discovered gold mines of California and Australia, claiming that gold for money-coinage purposes would soon become so abundant that gold money would nearly lose its value

They advised the leading nations of the world to adopt their views for the reasons stated; and I do not question but that the policy of the single standard (?) of silver would to-day be fastened upon the leading nations of the world but for the later discovery that the gold mines were actually yielding very much less than was anticipated and silver mines more; hence the change of tactics.

I will here submit extracts and verbatim quotations from previous acts of Congress, from April 2, 1792, to date, for the purpose of showing that Congress, by its solemn acts of legislation in the past, by the people making the members thereof a congress, together with judicial construction of the high courts of their various acts, has ever held and made a shuttlecock of the material of which money shall be lawfully made; and to show that money in the United States has heretofore, and constitutionally so, been made in part of bronze, zinc, tin, nickel, silver, gold, and, best of all, paper; and to further show that the material of which money is made has nothing whatever to do with the money properties imparted to it by the supreme law-making power-the peo-

That Congress has made full legal-tender debt-paying dollars of the same material and fineness, but of different weights of material, to circulate side by side, each the legal equivalent of the other as a purchasing or debt-paying dollar, and these also by the side of United States dollars that had no metal in them.

The following are the Congressional acts referred to.

April, 1792.—By the acts of Congress found first volume, chapter 16, page 246, passed April 2, 1792, the unit of value was made the silver dollar, and the following is the language of that law—part section 9:

Dollars or units—each to be of the value of a Spanish milled dollar as the ame is now current, and to contain three hundred and seventy-one grains and four-sixteenths of a grain of pure, or four hundred and sixteen grains of standard silver. Half-dollars—each to be of half the value of the dollar or unit, and to contain one hundred and eighty-five grains and ten-sixteenth parts of a grain of pure, or two hundred and eight grains of standard silver. Quarter-dollars—each to be of one-fourth the value of the dollar or unit, and to contain ninety-two grains and thirteen-sixteenth parts of a grain of pure, or one hundred and four grains of standard silver. Half-eagles—each to be of the value of $5, and to contain one hundred and twenty-three grains and six-eighths of a grain of pure, or one hundred and thirty-five grains of standard gold.

Section 20, same act, states:

And be it further enacted, That the money of account of the United States shall be expressed in dollars or units, dimes or tenths, cents or hundredths, and mills or thousandths.

June, 1834.—An act of Congress passed and approved June 28, 1834; found chapter 95, volume 4, page 699, first section reads: .

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the gold coins of the United States shall contain the following quantities of metal, that is to say; each eagle shall contain two hundred and thirty-two grains of pure gold, and two hundred and fifty-eight grains of standard gold; * * The half-eagle and quarter-eagle to be of relative qualities. * * Every such eagle shall be of the value of $10; every such half-eagle shall be of the value of $5; every such quarter-eagle shall be of the value of $2.50; and the said gold coin shall be receivable in payment of all debts when of full weight according to their respective values; when of less than full weight, at less value, proportioned to their respective actual weights.

January, 1837.—In chapter 3, volume 5, page 136, approved January 18, 1837, of the acts of Congress entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled "An act establishing a mint, and regulating the coins of the United States" "—section 3 thereof reads as follows:

of the United States'"—section 3 thereof reads as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the standard for both gold and silver coins of the United States shall hereafter be such, that of one thousand parts by weight, nine hundred shall be of pure metal, and one hundred of alloy; and the alloy of the silver coins shall be of copper; and the alloy of the gold coins shall be of copper and silver, provided that silver do not exceed one-half of the whole alloy.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That of the silver coins, the dollar shall be of the weight of four hundred and twelve and one-half grains; the half-dollar of the weight of two hundred and six and one-quarter grains; the quarter-dollar of the weight of one hundred and three and one-eighth grains; the dime, a tenth part of a dollar, of the weight of twenty grains and five-eighths of a grain. And that dollars, half-dollars and quarter-dollars, dimes and half-dimes shall be legal tender, of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sums whatever.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted. That of the gold coins, the weight of the eagle shall be two hundred and fifty-eight grains; that of the balf-eagle one hundred and twenty-nine grains; and that of the quarter-eagle sixty-four and one-half.

ne-nail. And that for all sums whatever, the eagle shall be a legal tender of payment or ten dollars; the half-eagle for five dollars, and the quarter-eagle for two and

By sections 14 and 18 of this act the holders or owners of gold or silver can have the same coined for their sole use or benefit, when pre sented in sums of value of one hundred or more dollars, and suitable for mint purposes, at a charge for contingent expenses of the mint.

March, 1849.—Chapter 109 of volume 9, page 397, approved March 3, 1849, of the acts of Congress, first states that there shall be "struck and coined at the mint of the United States * * coins of gold of the following denominations and values, namely, double-eagles, each to be of the value of twenty dollars or units, and gold dollars each to be the value of one dollar or unit."

Section 2 of this act reads as follows:

And be it further enacted, That for all sums whatever the double eagle shall a legal tender for twenty dollars, and the gold dollar a legal tender for one

March, 1851.—By act of Congress approved March 3, 1851, three-cent pieces composed of three-fourths part silver and one-fourth part copper were made "lawful money" and a "legal tender" in payment of all debts of 30 cents and under.

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the first day of June, eighteen hundred two (three) (in fact 1853) the weight of the half-dollar, or piece of fifty cents, shall be one hundred and ninety-two grains, and the quarter-dollar, dime, and half-dime shall be, respectively, one-half, one-fifth, and one-tenth of the weight of said half-dollar.

Section 2 said act of Congress reads:

And be it further enacted, That the silver coins issued in conformity with the above section shall be legal tenders in payment of debts for all sums not exceeding five dollars.

The latter paragraph of section 4 this act reads:

Be it further enacted, * * * Provided, however, That the amount coined in quarter dollars, dimes, and helf dimes shall be regulated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

This last section, so far as my researches have discovered, was the very first act of Congress giving into the hands of one man, the Secretary of the Treasury, the autocratic power to restrict the coinage of silver into money on his sole judgment.

This act was approved by Millard Fillmore in the last month of his Presidency, i. e., February, 1853, and was to take effect by section 8 thereof, June 1, 1853.

March, 1853.—By act of Congress approved March 3, 1853, a part of the act of Congress approved February 21, 1853, was repealed and instead thereof it was, "Be it enacted" that the act of February 21, 1853, "shall take effect and be in full force from and after April 1, 1853." "And that hereafter the three cent coin now authorized by law shall be made of the weight of the three-fiftieths of the weight of the half-dollar, as provided in said act, and of the same standard of fineness."

February, 1857.—By act of Congress, approved February 21, 1857, volume 11, page 163, relating to foreign coins and the coinage of the cent; section 1 thereof reads as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the pieces commonly known as the quarter, eighth, and sixteenth of the Spanish pillar dollar, and the Mexican dollar, shall be receivable at the Treasury of the United States and its several offices, and at the several post-offices and land offices, at the rates of valuation following—that is to say, the fourth of a dollar, or piece of two reals, at twenty cents; the eighth of a dollar, or piece of one real, at ten cents; and the sixteenth of a dollar, or half real, at five cents.

Section 4 of this act provides for the coinage of copper cents, composed of 72 grains, 88 per cent. to be of copper and 12 per cent. of nickel. Section 3 of this act repeals all former acts authorizing the currency of foreign gold and silver coins, and declares that the same shall not be a legal tender in payment of debts.

April, 1864.—By act of Congress approved April 22,1864, volume 13 age 54, the cent coined at the mint was made to weigh 48 grains, and be composed of 95 per cent. of copper and 5 per cent. of tin and zinc; also, a 2-cent piece of twice the weight of 1-cent pieces, but same material and fineness. By section 4 of this act these 1-cent pieces were declared a legal tender in any payment to the amount of 10 cents, and 2-cent coin to the amount of 20 cents.

Thus we see that twice the weight of the same material and fineness

Into we see that twice the weight of the same material and ineness in one piece is made a legal tender in payment of debts for 20 cents, while the other piece, of the same material and fineness, but half the weight, is a legal tender for only 10 cents in one payment.

March, 1865.—By act of Congress approved March 3, 1865, volume 18, page 517, chapter 100, it was "Be it enacted" that there should be coined at the mint of the United States a 3-cent piece, of weight 30 grains of copper and nickel, the nickel not to exceed 25 per cent. of weight of material weight of material

By section 3 of this act said 3-cent piece "shall be" a legal tender in any payment of the amount of 60 cents.

Section 6 of this act reads:

And be it further enacted. That the one and two cent coins of the United States shall not be a legal tender for any payment exceeding four cents in amount; and so much of the laws of the United States heretofore enacted as are in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

May, 1866.—By act of Congress approved May 16, 1866, chapter 81, volume 14, page 47, it was "Be it enacted" that there should be coined at the mint of the United States a 5-cent piece, the standard weight of which should be 77.16 grains composed of copper and nickel, the nickel not to exceed 25 per cent. of its weight.

By section 3 of this act it was "Be it enacted" that said coins shall be a legal tender in any payment to the amount of $1.

By section 5 of this act it was "Be it enacted" that the Treasurer and assistant treasurer should redeem these coins in national currency

"when presented in sums of not less than $100."

March, 1871.—By act of Congress approved March 3, 1871, chapter 124, volume 16, page 580, it was "Be it enacted" that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to redeem in lawful money, under such rules and regulations as he may from time to time prescribe, all copper, bronze, copper-nickel, and base metal coinage of every kind heretofore authorized by law, when presented in sums of not less than $20.

not less than $20. * * *

February, 1873.—By act of Congress approved February 12, 1873, chapter 131, volume 17, page 424, it was "Be it enacted," by section 14 of this act, "that the gold coins of the United States shall be a one-dollar piece," "two-dollar piece," "three-dollar piece," "five-dollar piece," "tren-dollar piece," "The standard weight of the gold dollar shall be 25.8 grains. 9 fine;" and the other gold coins same ratio, and each and all a legal tender in payment of all debts whatsoever; and the gold dollar declared the "unit of value." From 1792 to date of this act, the silver dollar—"Dollar of our dads"—had been by law of Congress the "unit of value." This act demonetizes all silver coins in the United States previously

This act demonetizes all silver coins in the United States previously coined, except the half-dollar, quarter-dollar, and dime, and enacts that these three silver coins, that is, 50, 25, and 10 cent pieces, together with the trade-dollar, composed of 420 grains of standard silver, should be a legal tender for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

Section 16 of this act demonetizes all minor or base metal coinage, and "enacts" that the minor coins of the United States shall be a 5cent piece, a 3-cent piece, and a 1-cent piece, which shall be a legal tender for any amount not exceeding 25 cents in any one payment. Section 17 of said act reads:

That no coins, either of gold, silver, or minor coinage, shall hereafter be issued from the mint other than those of the denominations, standards, and weights herein set forth.

By section 19 of this act the owners of gold and silver metal may, at their option, have the same cast into bars of fine metal, or standard fineness of not less than five ounces and stamped to prevent fraudulent imitations.

By section 20 of this act the owners of gold bullion may have the same formed into coin or bars for their benefit.

By section 21 of this act the owners of silver bullion may deposit the of 420 grains, troy, and no deposits of silver for other coinage shall be received.

March, 1875.—By the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, chapter 143, volume 18, page 478, it was "Be it enacted" that there should be coined from time to time a 20-cent piece of the weight of five grams. Section 2 of this act makes them a legal tender for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

April, 1876.—By act of Congress approved April 17, 1876, chapter 63, volume 19, page 33, it was "Be it enacted" that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to issue coins of the United States of the denominations of 10, 20, 25, and 50 cents silver pieces, standard value, in redemption of an equal amount of fractional currency, and thus continue, until the whole amount of such fractional currency outstanding is redeemed.

July, 1876.—By act of Congress approved July 22, 1876, volume 19, page 215, it was (this time) "Resolved" that the Secretary of the Treasury may issue silver coin from the Treasury not exceeding $10,-00,000, in exchange for an equal amount of legal-tender notes, and said notes only to be reissued on the retirement and destruction of a like sum of fractional currency, and that when such fractional currency is so received it shall be destroyed.

Section 2 of this act destroys the legal-tender, debt-paying properties of the trade-dollar ties of the trade-dollar.

February, 1878.—By act of Congress, February 28, 1878, it was:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That there shall be coined at the several mints of the United States silver dollars of the weight of four hundred and twelve and one-half grains troy, of standard silver, as provided in the act of January eighteenth, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, on which shall be the devices and superscriptions provided by said act, which coins, together with all silver dollars heretofore coined by the United States, of like weight and fineness, shall be a legal tender, at their nominal value, for all debts and dues, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract.

Section 3 of this act authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury and assistant treasurers to receive these dollars on deposit in sums of not less than $10, and issue therefor certificates, "which shall be receivable for customs, taxes, and all public dues, and, when so received, may be reissued.

Section 4 of this act repeals all acts or parts of acts inconsistent therewith.

This act of Congress was vetoed by President Hayes, but was passed over his veto by a constitutional majority of each branch of Congress, and became a law February 28, 1878.

May, 1878.—By act of Congress approved May 2, 1878, it was "Be it enacted" that the coinage of 20-cent pieces is prohibited.

The Revised Statutes of the United States, title 39, page 708, under the head of "legal-tender," reads as follows:

SEC. 3584. No foreign gold or silver coin shall be a legal tender in payment of debts.

Under title 37, same book, page 696, we find as follows:

SEC. 3311. The gold coins of the United States shall be a one-dollar piece, which at the standard weight of twenty-five and eight-tenths grains shall be the unit of value.

SEC. 3885. The gold coins of the United States shall be a legal tender in all of value.

SEC. 3585. The gold coins of the United States shall be a legal tender in all payments at their nominal value when not below the standard weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single piece, and, when reduced in weight below such standard and tolerance, shall be a legal tender at valuation in proportion to their actual weight.

SEC. 3513, Revised Statutes of the United States, page 696, states as follows: "The silver coins of the United States shall be a trade-dollar, a half-dollar or fifty-cent piece, a quarter-dollar or twenty-five-cent piece, a dime or ten-cent piece; and the weight of the trade-dollar shall be four hundred and twenty grains, troy, the weight of the half-dollar should be tweive grams and one-half of a gram (4. a., 192.9½ grains); the quarter-dollar and the dime shall be, respectively, one-half and one-fifth of the weight of the said half-dollar."

SEC. 3586. The silver coins of the United States shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding five dollars in any one payment.

SEC. 3587. The minor coins of the United States shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding twenty-five cents in any one payment.

July, 1876.—By joint resolution of Congress, July 22, 1876, found in volume 19, page 215, section 2, said act, reads as follows:

That the trade-dollar shall not hereafter be a legal tender, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to limit from time to time the coinage thereof to such an amount as he may deem sufficient to meet the export demand for the same.

Here we see that the big dollar of 420.9 grains fine has its legal-tender (debt-paying) qualities taken away by Congress.

SEC. 3588. United States notes shall be lawful money, and a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, within the United States, except for duties on imports and interest on the public debt.

I quote the foregoing acts of Congress verbatim et literatum, when so marked, or state the substance of the facts in other sections designated, for the purpose of showing that Congress, by its solemn acts of legislation in the past, by the authority of the people making them a Congress, together with judicial construction of the high courts of these various acts of Congress, has ever held and made a shuttle-cock of the material of which money shall lawfully be made.

These changes have been made, I aver, to keep the money volume so limited that the comparatively few could control it, and thus at pleasure manipulate prices against the interests of the many, thus creating a money aristocracy on the one hand and pauperized labor on the other.

The effect of volume of money on prices of labor and the products of labor, as well as the opportunity to secure a sufficient supply out of gold labor, as well as the opportunity to secure a sufficient supply out of gold and silver to keep even step and pace with the business demands in this age of electricity, steam, and machinery, is better shown in the statements made by the Silver Commission in their report, first volume, from which I shall now quote liberally to further sustain myself in the posi-

SILVER COMMISSION, 1876-EFFECT OF VOLUME OF MONEY ON PRICES.

I now make quotations from the first volume of the reports of the Silver Commission, created by joint resolution of Congress, August, 1876.

This commission was to consist of three Senators, appointed by the Senate; three members of the House, appointed by the Speaker, and three experts to be selected by and associated with them.

The commission, as organized, consisted of Senators John P. Jones, Lewis V. Bogy, and George S. Boutwell; also Representatives Randall L. Gibson, George L. Willard, and Richard P. Bland.

The three experts were Hon. William S. Groesbeck, of Ohio; Professor Francis Bowen, of Massachusetts; George M. Weston, of Maine,

These nine gentlemen were members of the Republican and Democratic parties, but with singular fidelity to the trust, made extensive inquiries in the premises of their appointed duties, and submitted a report, which evidences the highest ability in comprehensive argument from fact statements, as also a most exhaustive inquiry in all the fields of information.

Their statements make it clearly evident that the doctrines and teachings of the National party are essential to the welfare of the whole

On page 66, volume 1, Reports of Silver Commission, we read that nine nations, with an estimated population of 768,944,456, have the so-called silver standard.

That of these nine Russia and Austria have legal-tender paper money.

On page 67, same volume, we read that there are fourteen nations with an estimated population of 137,300,000, that have the so-called double standard of gold and silver.

Of these Italy has legal-tender paper money, but substantially no metallic money in circulation, while of these fourteen Holland, France, Belgium, Switzerland, and Spain have either limited or entirely suspended the coinage of silver.

Same page and book we read that there are seven nations, with an estimated population of 92,800,000, that have the so-called gold standard. This list of thirty nations does not include the United States, which to-day has a full or partial legal-tender money, with or without exceptions, gold, silver, nickel, copper, amalgam, and paper.
World's stock of gold and silver, 1848, on page 7, same book, we read

It is one of the common estimates that in 1848, the date of the California discoveries, the bullion value of the world's stock of plate, coin, and bars was $2,800,000,000 in gold and $4,000,000,000 in silver, but of coin and bars alone $1,200,000,000 in gold and $2,200,000,000 in silver. The total production of gold and silver in the five years ending with 1856 was $950,000,000, being an addition of only 14 per cent. to the total stock, inclusive of plate, or of 28 per cent. to the stock in coins and bars.

In twenty-eight years (that is, 1848 to 1875) ending with 1875, the aggregate production of gold and silver was $4,582,500,000.

By this report we find the sum of all productions of gold and silver, prior to 1875, in the world was $11,392,000,000, being in coin, bullion, bars, plate, watch-cases, bad teeth, finger, ear, and other rings, besides that employed in the arts and sciences in various ways.

On pages 47 and 48, same book, we read as follows:

On pages 47 and 48, same book, we read as follows:

The world has generally favored, theoretically, if not practically, the automatic metallic system, and adjusted its business to it. Some nations adopted one metal as their standard, and some the other, and some adopted both.

Those that adopted both served as a balance-wheel to steady with exactness their relative value. * * * While some nations have changed their money metal, or having had paper money, have resumed specie payments in one metal, the policy of a general demonetization of one of the metals was first broached only about twenty years ago. About ten years later a formidable propaganda was organized to fasten that policy upon the commercial world.

This new school of financial theorists advocate the retention of metal as the material of money, but favor its subjection to governmental interference in every respect. Whenever new mines are discovered or old ones yield or promise to yield more abundantly, instead of freely accepting their product in accordance with the automatic theory they advocate its rejection through the restriction or the absolute prohibition of the coinage of either or both metals, or through the limitation or the abolition of the legal-tender functions of one of them. Whenever the interests of the creditor and income classes seem to be in danger of being impaired by an increase in the volume and decrease in the value of money, or, in other words, by a general rise in prices, the modern theorists are clamorous in double-standard countries for the demonetization of one of the money metals, and in single-standard countries for the shifting of the money function from the metal which promises the most to the one that promises the least abundant supply.

They are extremely anxious for the retention of the metal of which the money standard is composed, when such metal is rising in value and prices are falling, and exceedingly apprehensive of the evil and inconvenience which they predict as sure to result from changing it. Whenever a fall in prices occurs, through either a natural or artificial contraction in the value of money, they maintain that it is due to antecedent inflation and extravagance, or to overproduction through persistent and reckless industry.

If the contraction be natural, that it can not be helped; and if artificial, that, though it may inflict great temporary losses on the masses of the people, it will be sure to result in their ultimate benefit, and they console the sufferers with the comforting (?) assurance that such contraction is necessary in order to reach the lowest depths of that "hard-pan" whose foundations they have previously undermined by demonetizing one of the metals, and upon which alone they claim that money, capital, and labor can securely and harmoniously rest. But when the material composing the standard is falling in value and prices are rising, they immediately discover that the maintenance of the value of the standard is the all-important consideration, and that its material is of no importance whatever, and should be at once changed to "redress the situation." After having reduced one of the metals to a commodity by depriving it of the money function, these theorists complacently point to the resulting fluctuations in its value as a justification of the act producing them, and as a conclusive proof of the unifities for money of the demonetized metal.

If the world, or any considerable portion of it, should follow the teachings of this new school of economists, and discard one metal, and one-half of the automatic theory, it need not surprise them if the resulting financial and commercial disasters should teach and enforce the policy of discarding the other half of the theory and the other metal, and of establishing some system of money, however unscientific, under which all classes and interests could at least have an equal chance of protection.

On page 46, some book, we read the following concerning the "fiatmoney school:"

They claim that every argument against investing with the money function a material not possessing intrinsic value is, when analyzed, an impeachment of the integrity and capacity of the people and of their fitness for self-government, and a claim that the regulation of the most important institution of civilization can be more safely remitted to the edicts of chance than to the guidance of human wisdom.

* * That the failures of one age often become the established successes man wisdom.

* * That the failures of one age often become the established successes of the next. That every progressive movement of mankind has been tedious and toilsome, and has been accomplished only through trial, suffering, and the disappointment of repeated failures.

That every step of this progress has been impeded by a sinister conservatism, which glorifies everything, even tyranny and stupidity, if hoary with age, and always seeks to rivet the needs of the present to the decaying and imperfect systems of the past, and to deny to the human race the hopes and possibilities of the future.

tems of the past, and to deny to the human race the hopes and possible future. * *

That in most countries coin money has been sometimes supplemented and sometimes superseded by promises to pay coin, which were always broken when coin was demanded.

That the next step in many countries has been a coinage maintained above its bullion value through limitation of quantity and the stamp of authority as in subsidiary silver coinages, and at the present time in the entire silver coinage in the states of the Latin Union. And that, since the success of this last step, in preserving, through limitation of quantity, a steadiness of money value above and wholly independent of intrinsic value has been assured, it would be presumptuous to affirm that the same means may not furnish, without any intrinsic value whatever, a better and steadier money than the world has ever seen.

INCREASING VOLUME-EFFECT.

On page 49, same book, we read:

On page 49, same book, we read:

Whenever gold and silver prices have become adjusted to a given stock of those metals, an increase of that stock, other things remaining unchanged, will cause a rise, and a decrease will cause a fall, in prices.

But under such conditions other things never do remain unchanged. There are powerful causes, moral and material, which invariably operate, when money is increasing in volume, to moderate the rise in prices and to intensify their fall when it is decreasing.

Hence, the fall in prices caused by a decreasing volume of money would be much greater in degree than would be the rise caused by a proportionately increasing volume.

Whenever it becomes apparent that prices are rising and money falling in value in consequence of an increase in its volume, the greatest activity takes place in exchanges and productive enterprises. Every one becomes anxious to share in the advantages of rising markets. The inducement to hoard money is taken away, and consequently the disposition to hoard it ceases. Its circulation becomes exceedingly active, and for the very plain reason that there could be no motive for holding or hoarding money when it is falling in value, while there would be the strongest possible motive for exchanging it for property, or for the labor which creates property, when prices are rising. Under these circumstances labor comes into great demand and at remunerative wages.

This results in not only increased production, but increased con-

This results in not only increased production, but increased consumption.

The wants and expenditures of laborers increase with their earnings. Large enterprises, safe and unsafe, are at such times inaugurated by eager adventurers, and, as frequently as otherwise, upon insufficient capital.

On pages 49 and 50, same book, we read the most terrible indictment of the Republican party and its financial policy, from the administration of General Grant as President all along through the dark days and panic of 1873—"Black Friday"—and up to the date of an increasing volume of money in circulation, its effect on general prices of labor and the products of labor.

While discussing this feature of the money question by a system of quotations from eminent authority, the reader must always bear in mind that the legal value of a dollar, its multiples or parts, never changes, except to exist and not to exist.

DECREASING VOLUME-ITS EFFECTS.

At the Christian era the metallic money of the Roman Empire amounted to $1,800,000,000.

By the end of the fifteenth century it had shrunk to less than $200,000,000.

During this period a most extraordinary and baleful change took place in the condition of the world. Population dwindled, and commerce, arts, wealth, and freedom all disappeared. The people were reduced by poverty and misery to the most degraded conditions of serfdom and slavery. The disintegration of society was almost complete. The conditions of life were so hard, that individual selfishness was the only thing consistent with the instinct of self-preservation. All public spirit, all generous emotions, all the noble aspirations of man shriveled and disappeared as the volume of money shrunk and prices fell.

History records no such disastrous transition as that from the Roman Empire to the Dark Ages. Various explanations have been given of this entire breaking down of the framework of society, but it was certainly coincident with a shrinkage in the volume of money, which was also without historical parallel.

The crumbling of institutions kept even step and pace with the shrinkage in the stock of money and the falling of prices. All other attendant circumstances than these last have occurred in other historical periods unaccompanied and unfollowed by any such mighty

It is a suggestive coincidence that the first glimmer of light only came with the invention of bills of exchange and paper substitutes, through which the scanty stock of the precious metals was increased in efficiency.

STEADINESS OF INCREASING VOLUME-ITS EFFECTS.

On pages 51 and 52, same book, we read as follows:

It is in a volume of money keeping even pace with advancing population and commerce, and in the resulting steadiness of prices, that the wholesome nutriment of a healthy vitality is to be found. The highest moral, intellectual, and material development of nations is promoted by the use of money unchanging in its value.

That kind of money, instead of being the oppressor, is one of the great instrumentalities of commerce and industries.

Steadiness in prices insures labor to all and exacts labor from all.

It gives security to credit and stability and prosperity to business.

It encourages large enterprises requiring time for their development, and crowns with success well-matured and carefully executed plans.

It discourages purely speculative ventures, and especially those based upon discoter.

It metes out justice to both debtor and creditor, and secures credit to those eserve it.

deserve it.

It prevents capital from oppressing labor and labor from oppressing capital, and secures to each its just share of the fruits of industry and enterprise.

It secures a reasonable interest for its use to the lenders of money, and a just share in the profits of production to the borrower.

It keeps up the distinction between a mortgage and a deed.

It insures a moderate competence to the many rather than colossal fortunes to the few at the expense of the many.

EFFECTS OF A DECREASING VOLUME OF MONEY.

On page 53, same book, we read:

On page 53, same book, we read:

While the volume of money is decreasing, even although very slowly, the value of each unit of money is increasing in corresponding ratio and property is falling in price.

Those who have contracted to pay money find that it is constantly becoming more difficult to meet their engagements. The margins of securities melt rapidly away, and the confiscation by the creditor of the property on which they are based becomes only a question of time.

All productive enterprises are discouraged and stagnate because the cost of producing commodities to-day will not be covered by the prices obtainable for them to morrow. Exchanges become sluggish, because those who have money will not part with it for either property or services beyond the requirements of actual current necessities, for the obvious reason that money alone is increasing in value, while everything else is declining in price.

This results in the withdrawal of money from the channels of circulation, and its deposit in great hoards, where it can exert no influence on prices. This hoarding of money from the nature of things must continue and increase not only until the shrinking of its volume has actually ceased, but until capitalists are entirely satisfied that money lying idle on special deposit will no longer afford them revenue, and that the lowest level of prices had been reached.

It is this hoarding of money, when its volume shrinks, which causes a fall in prices greater than would be caused by the direct effect of a decrease in the stock of money.

Money in shrinking volume becomes the paramount object of commerce instead of its beneficent instrument.

Instead of mobilizing industry, it poisons and dries up its life currents. It is the fruitful source of political and social disturbance.

It foments strife between labor and other forms of capital, while itself, hidden away in security, gorges on both.

It rewards close-fisted lenders and filches from and bankrupts enterprising borrowers.

It circulates freely in the stock

On pages 53 and 54, we read (this was in August, 1876, and reviewed the continuing results of the panic of 1873):

the continuing results of the panic of 1873):

The great and still continuing fall in the prices in the United States has proved most disastrous to nearly every industrial enterprise.

The bitter experience of the last few years has been an expensive but most thorough teacher.

It has taught capitalists neither to invest in nor loan money on such enterprises, and just as thoroughly has it taught business men not to borrow for the purpose of inaugurating or prosecuting them.

Of the few business enterprises now being successfully prosecuted, the larger part are based on a monopoly secured either by patents or exceptional conditions.

The business man has discovered that the less active and enterprising he is the better he is off.

The manufacturer avoids loss by damping down furnace fires and slowing down machinery.

The miners ascend from the dark and gloomy depths of the mine with a scanty pittance called wages to find in a famishing household a gloom that is more profound.

They await with heroic fortitude and a sometimes impatient hope the advent of another Sir Humphrey Davy, with a lamp capable of shedding fight on the cause of existing evils, and of protecting them and all others who depend on their labor for their daily bread against a lingering misery more to be dreaded than the deathly danger that lurks in the treacherous fire-damp.

Securities have already become so impaired through falling prices that loanable capital has fled affrighted from the newer and more sparsely settled sections of the country, and accumulated in large amounts in the great financial centers where securities are more ample.

The personal and property securities of individuals have generally ceased to be available, except at the highest rates of interest, or at ruinously low valuations.

tions.

Money can be borrowed readily only upon securities, as bonds which are based on the unlimited tax-levying power of the Government, or upon the bonds and stocks of first-class trunk lines of railroad corporations, whose freight and fare rates are practically a tax upon the entire population and resources of the regions which they traverse and supply.

The competition among capitalists to loan money on these more ample securities has become very keen, and such securities command money at unprecedentedly low rates.

These low and lowering rates of interest, instead of denoting financial strength and industrial prosperity, are a gauge of increasing prostration.

The foregoing solemn statements of eminent men accord with the voice of history and of experience as well, that when one-half of the money of a people, or nation, is destroyed, or taken out of circulation, the remaining part must be in greatly increased demand, and corre spondingly dear. In 1857 Germany demonetized gold, and the "hardpan" advocates issued a formidable propaganda, on the discovering of gold in California and Australia, claiming that the productions of this precious metal (?) would soon become so abundant as to nearly lose its value for purposes of money.

CONTRACTION BY REFUNDING.

On page 7 of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, United States of America, 1879, we find the following statements, namely:

During the following year it increased nearly seven hundred millions, reaching July 1, 1864, the sum of $1,815,784,370. During the next nine months to the close of the war, April 1, 1865, the debt increased at the rate of about two millions a day, or sixty millions a month, and for the five months next thereafter, at the rate of about three millions a day, or ninety millions a month, reaching its maximum on August 31, 1865 (see report of Secretary McCulloch, 1867, page 4; also his report of 1868, page 41), at which date it amounted to $2,845,907,626 (less cash in the Treasury, $88,218,055), and was composed of the following items:

The annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency, December 6, 1880, page 51, states as follows:

The following table exhibits the amount and kinds of outstanding paper currency of the United States and of the national banks on August 31, 1865, when the public debt reached its maximum, and annually thereafter at the dates named, with the currency price of gold and the gold price of currency at the same

Now let us see how this Comptroller of the Currency can pervert facts, by comparing his report of 1879, page 7, with his report of 1880, page 51.

In 1879 report he gives outstanding on August 31, 1865, page 7, as fol-

It will be perceived that the report of 1879 does not include $176,213. 955 of national-bank notes. Deduct this sum, then count the fractional currency and the 7.30 notes as legal-tender notes (see section 3590, page 708, Title XXXIX, Legal Tender, of the Revised Statutes of the United States), and you will find that, by these reports, there were in circulation of United States paper money in 1865, $1,540,483,701.51; while by the report of 1880 there were only, in August, 1865, $635,515,574; all told, less national-bank notes, $495,301,619.

This showing does not take into consideration any gold or silver.
On page 15 of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1879 the following table will be found, which shows the average value of the gold dollar in legal-tender paper dollars, during the month of July in each year, from and including 1865 to and including 1878, also the highest average market price of the articles named in Chicago same month and same year, for each of said months and years.

The Inter-Ocean, of Chicago, in its issue of July 20, 1878, editorially

The anti-greenback papers of this city are in the habit of stating, every now and then, that the volume of currency has been but slightly decreased, and that the amount per capita in 1855 and 1878 varied very little, being from $14 to $15. The Inter-Ocean has taken occasion at various times to refute this assertion, and, in doing so, has given figures that can not be successfully disputed. We produce below a table compiled from official sources. We have added the year 1877, and also the population and the amount per capita to the table:

The currency included in the above amounts comprises demand and one and two year Treasury notes authorized by the acts of December 27, 1857, December 17, 1860, and March 2, 1861; temporary ten-day loan and one-year certificates of indebtedness; Treasury notes payable in two years and sixty days; 7.30 three-year notes; compound-interest notes, 3 per cent. certificates; non-interest-bearing demand and legal tender notes; fractional currency; State bank notes, and mational-bank notes.

† The bulk of these issues were made legal-tender by the Government, but that characteristic was not indispensable to constitute them parts of the money volume; for, was that necessary, then State bank and national-bank issues could not be counted as part of the currency, these never having been made legal tenders.

not be counted as part of the currency, these never having been made legal tenuers.

I We are prepared to prove, however, that all the above issues were employed as currency, and went to make up the volume of circulating medium. The 7.30 three-year notes, whose circulation as currency is most scouted, were outstanding on the 1st of September, 1865, to the amount of $830,000,000, every dollar of which was legal-tender for its face value under the terms of the law "to the same extent as United States notes."

We have not the space or time now to dwell upon this part of the question, but we again state that these notes were employed as currency, as can be proved by the very highest authority.

It is, in our opinion, the highest of folly for the opponents of the so-called National party to deny facts so well established as is that of the contraction of the currency. If that party can not be defeated by a fair and honest statement of the truth, then it had better be allowed to win.

The Fifteenth General Assembly of Iowa, in 1874, had for its governor Cyrus C. Carpenter, and Joseph Dysart as lieutenant-governor. That Legislature, Republican in every department, passed the following joint resolutions, published with the "private and local laws" of the State at that session, at page 83, and in the house journal, commencing on page 225. In the session laws it appears as "joint resolutions" tion No. 14, for increase of currency," and is entitled:

Joint resolution memorializing Congress for an increase of the currency of the country.

Whereas the real and personal property of the country has increased nearly 100 per cent, in the last decade, and the value of manufactured products more than doubled during the same time, while the amount of currency in circulation has been contracted about $250,000,000; and Whereas we believe the amount of currency in the country, and especially in the Northwest, is inadequate to carry on the exchanges necessary for a healthy and prosperous condition of affairs; and, however desirable it may be to bring about specie payment, an undue contraction of the currency by which business is embarrassed and production impaired is not the proper method of obtaining that end: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That we request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to vote for such measures of relief as the present condition of the country demands, prominent among which, we believe, is a large addition to the present volume of currency of the country.

Resolved, That the secretary of state is hereby instructed to furnish each of our members of Congress with twenty-five copies of this resolution.

Approved, February 27, 1874.

Now, let us see how the Congress of the United States treated this reasonable and humane request of the Iowa Republican Legislature in 1874. The Comptroller of the Currency, in his report of 1880, page 51, states that in 1874, January 1, the aggregate legal-tender notes, old demand notes, fractional currency, notes of national banks, including gold notes, was as follows:

January 1, 1874	$777, 874, 367
January 1, 1875	782, 591, 165
January 1, 1876	762, 523, 690
January 1, 1877	714, 064, 358 689, 443, 922
January 1, 1879.	686, 642, 884

By this table on page 51, report of 1880, there is shown to have been a reduction of $95,948,281.

Add this sum to the profound statement of the Iowa Legislature in 1874, "about (?) two hundred and fifty millions contraction" prior, and you have "about (?) $345,948,281," by this showing from the standpoint of Republican official integrity.

On page 15 of the Comptroller's report of 1879 he gives the value of the gold dollar in "legal-tender paper dollars" for each year from 1864 to 1879. (See page 22.)

WELLER'S FORMULA OF FIGURES.

We see that volume of money in circulation determines the commercial value or purchasing power of each "unit," or dollar. This being true, let us inquire what benefit increased volume of money would be to the producers of wealth (for labor produces all wealth except that which, "the first great cause," God grants); the farmer, mechanic, artisan, wage-worker, to those who have "nothing to sell" (?) except labor.

except labor.

Grant me Beecher-bread-and-no-butter price—$1 per day; 75 cents of this to provide a home, and feed, clothe, and educate the children and help Christianize society by building school-houses, pay taxes, recreation, contribute to charities, and pay the minister, &c. I have left, as a mathematical proposition, just 25 cents with which to buy my home, pay interest on my indebtedness, cancel mortgages and notes, and my annual share of the State and national bonds and interest thereon.

annual share of the State and national bonds and interest thereon.

Now, if by reducing—contracting—the volume of money in circulation so that 50 cents will buy as much as a dollar would (and that is "hard-pan," "specie basis," resumption argument), why should I complain that my wages are reduced from $1 to 50 cents per day? If there is no just cause of complaint, why complain if the volume of money is reduced (contracted) so that 25 cents will buy as much as 50 cents? Or to 12½ cents per day, it buying as much in the market as the 25 cents formerly did?

Let us look at this matter a little. Why, if it makes no difference

Let us look at this matter a little. Why, if it makes no difference, should any one complain at having free coinage of silver, thus increasing the volume of money in circulation until $2 will buy no more than ing no more because of its cheapness (?) than the $1 or $2 at the former status of money matters? If sauce for the goose should be sometimes sauce for the gander—the rule working both ways occasionally—who should object?

I do, broadly and emphatically! I am a laboring man, a producer, a tax-payer, have a family of children I wish to educate, and provide them with a little surplus cash to start out in life with, and desire to build a better house, to contribute to public enterprises and public charities, which I can not do if all the cash net of my life's labors goes to pay interest to my cash creditors and the State and nation's bond creditors. So I desire a condition of things as to money matters that I can, with a given outlay of effort in a given time, lay by for my creditors and the nation's creditors the greatest possible sum of "legal-tender dollars," "lawful money," with which to cancel all my money obligations, thus stopping interest out, putting it by for the purpose named. Be it remembered ever that the legal, debt-paying value of money never changes, except to exist and not exist. The legal debt-paying properties—the property imparted by the law-making power that creates money—never fluctuates; it is stationary, year in and out. pay interest to my cash creditors and the State and nation's bond cred-

121	09½	03½
2 00	1 50	50
4 00	3 00	1 00

I do not care to suggest more than $4 per day for wage-workers and mechanics, lest the simple suggestion should precipitate some "venerable" (?), "meek, and lowly follower" (?) with gray hairs sorrowing into an untimely grave.

Mortgaged home, $1,000.

Thus we see that, $1 per day and 25 cents "left," it takes 400 days to pay the interest, for interest and debt—national, State, and individual—must be paid out of "sum left" after cost of living is paid. This case, it taking 400 days to pay the interest and there being but 313 work days in a year, the debtor finds himself "short" 87 days. This is deferred by "credit note." But the next turn of the thumbscrews of contraction finds him short 487 days, which means credit gone for a chattel-mortgage substitute.

The next turn toward "hard-pan" finds the debtor "short" 1,287 The next turn toward "hard-pan" finds the debtor "short" 1,287 days. This means a mortgage on everything, as well present as future.

The next turn reaches out to "specie basis" and "resumption," and the court of last resort—the high sheriff (?)—bids the debtor go! in the name of law, good order, and the Christian teachings of the nineteenth century, out into God's land, if he can find any that monopolists have not gobbled; or go, as the tramp, branded by law.

But of the up-turn to $2 per day, the "sum left" at this price, he pays his interest with 200 days' work, and has 113 left to work for wife, babies, home, improvement, with something to spare to pay the principal of debt.

principal of debt.

principal of debt.

But of the up-turn to $4 per day he pays his interest with 100 days' work, and has 213 left to apply for God, home, and humanity.

This means the debt honestly paid, the mortgage canceled, hopes realized, wife cheerful, children gay, hearthstone loves brightened, family educated, society built up—a better citizen—a man.

It means every reform possible that an intelligent, humane, Christian person in the whole world in the light of and in accord with true, sound philosophy should, could, or would conscientiously advocate.

The Iowa Legislature in 1874 by joint resolution requested Congress to put a stop to contraction; yet Congress, by act of June 20, 1874, section 4, chapter 343, volume 18, page 123, by "Be it enacted," gave permission to national banks to retire their circulation and withdraw their bonds by covering into the Treasury legal-tender notes. bonds by covering into the Treasury legal-tender notes.

SEC. 4. That any association organized under this act, or any of the acts of which this is an amendment, desiring to withdraw its circulating notes, in whole or in part, may, upon the deposit of lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States in sums of not less than $9,000, take up the bonds which said association has on deposit with the Treasurer for the security of such circulating notes, which bonds shall be assigned to the bank in the manner specified in the nineteenth section of the national-bank act; and the outstanding notes of said association, to an amount equal to the legal-tender notes deposited, shall be redeemed at the Treasury of the United States, and destroyed as now provided by law: Provided, That the amount of the bonds on deposit for circulation shall not be reduced below $50,000.

Under this "Be it enacted" the banks retired millions, as shown by

Under this "Be it enacted" the banks retired millions, as shown by the Comptroller's report, page 51, 1880; property passed into the hands of the wealthy. In January 14, 1875, they secured the passage of another "Be it enacted," which enabled them, at the proper time, to issue more currency, bring on a business boom, so that they might unload their plunder, filched from labor at an enormous profit.

Law of January 14, 1875, quoted:

Sec. 3. That section 5177 of the Revised Statutes, limiting the aggregate amount of circulating notes of national banking associations, be, and is hereby, repealed; and each existing banking association may increase its circulating notes in accordance with existing law without respect to said aggregate limit; and new banking associations may be organized in accordance with existing law, without respect to said aggregate limit; and new banking association may be organized in accordance with existing law, without respect to said aggregate limit; and revisions of law for the withdrawal and redistribution of national-bank currency among the several States and Territories are hereby repealed.

And whenever, and so often, as circulating notes shall be issued to any such banking association, so increasing its capital or circulating notes, or so newly organized as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of Secretary of the Treasury to redeem the legal-tender United States notes in excess only of $300,000,000, to the amount of 80 per cent. of the sum of mational-bank notes so issued to any such banking association as aforesaid, and to continue such redemption as such circulating notes are issued, until there shall be outstanding the sum of $300,000,000 to the hanking association as aforesaid, and to continue such redemption as such circulating notes are issued, until there shall be outstanding the sum of $300,000,000 to fouch legal-tender United States notes, and no more. And on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem, in coin, United States legal-ten

An increase of the volume of money and currency under this "Be it enacted" began about 1880.

On page 11 of Comptroller's report, 1880, he states that the amount

On page 11 of Comptroller's report, 1880, he states that the amount of coin and currency in the country on January 1, 1879, was $1,055,-356,619. On the same page, in same table, that the amount November 1, 1880, was $1,302,798,480. This showing gives an increase since January 1, 1879, to November 1, 1880, of $247,441,861.

This does not consider silver certificates, increase of national-bank notes, importations, mining and minting of gold and silver and copper and nickel and tin and zinc into money since November 1, 1880, of which many millions have been added to the money and currency volume since above date, as see Comptroller's and Secretary's reports of 1881

All the business boom this country has had in the last three years to speak of has come because of an addition to the money volume, coupled with the fact that John Sherman, prior to 1879, ordered, without authority of law, that greenbacks or Treasury notes should be received at par, same as gold, in payment of duties on imports.

John Sherman, in his report as Secretary of the Treasury, in 1880,

While no distinction as to value is made between coin and notes in business transactions, a marked preference is shown for notes, owing to their superior convenience in counting and carrying.

There is no law to-day authorizing the receipt of United States notes for duties on imports any more than there was on Black Friday.

There is no specie resumption to-day any more than when the credit-strengthening act of March, 1869, was passed for him who has less than

The public faith of the United States was pledged in 1869 by solemn act of Congress to resume specie payments in 1869. Has that faith been kept?

The public faith was pledged by act of June 3, 1864, that not more than $300,000,000 of national-bank notes should be issued under that act, but this faith was broken by the act of January 14, 1867, associated by the second of the public state of the public state. pealed the limit, and permitted any existing national banking association to increase its circulating notes without respect to said aggregate

The public faith of the United States was pledged by act of June 30, 1864, that not more than $400,000,000 of United States notes (save $50,000,000 to redeem temporary obligations, temporarily required) should ever be issued, nor should any such notes issued under that act be used to redeem national-bank notes; yet this faith pledged has been

The public faith of the United States was pledged in 1873 that the silver dollar of the United States containing 420.9 grains, fine silver should be a dollar and a legal tender in payment of any sum of debt not exceeding $5; but this faith and pledge were broken by the act of July 22, 1876.

So I could relate scores of instances in which Congress has pledged the faith of the United States to the execution of certain matters in which many citizens of the United States thereunder had entered, but which were blotted out by a repeal of the law creating the conditions, matters, and opportunities, and no hue-and-cry was even raised that Congress had been a party to a repudiation of plighted faith. Why? Because Congress has no power to repudiate; because no act of a Congress of to-day can be so solemnly made, plighting the public faith to anything, or its execution in the future, that the same or a future Congress has not the constitutional, legal, and equitable right to repeal, and that without reference to what may have been done under a former act

This idea was clearly set forth in the opinion of the United States Supreme Court, 12 Wallace, pages 548 and 549, being the majority opinion of said court, which reads as follows on that point:

No one ever doubted that a debt of $1,000, contracted before 1834, could be paid by one hundred eagles ($1,000) coined after that year, though they contained no more gold than ninety-four eagles ($940) such as were coined when the contract was made and this not because of the intrinsic value of the coin, but because of

Same book, page 549, the United States Supreme Court states:

Every contract for the payment of money, simply, is necessarily subject to the constitutional power of the Government over the currency, whatever that power may be, and the obligation of the parties is, therefore assumed with reference to that power. Nor is this singular. A covenant for quiet enjoyment is not broken, nor is its obligation impaired by the (we the people) Government's taking the lanp granted in virtue of its right of eminent domain.

Congress has ever exercised the right to make and unmake a law, without reference to previous solemn enactments of the same or another Congress; and such laws have been sustained by the high courts as within the high prerogatives of the constitutional powers of Congress so to do

This being true, and the high courts have ever so decided, then every bond of the United States, whether due or not, is payable at the pleasure of the Government (Congress and the Executive as agents) in any material (money) that Congress may declare to be money and a legal

By the terms of existing law they all are payable in gold dollars.

By the terms of existing law they all are payable in standard silver dollars

By the terms of existing law they are all payable in United States (legal-tender paper) dollars.

The volume of dollars in circulation is too small.

The McPherson bill so states in a straightforward, diplomatic way, and proposes to remedy the evil by a greater evil.

The Dingley bill so states in a Wall-street way, but proposes to remedy the difficulty at the expense of the people—the Government—and to the increased benefit of the infernal shylocks that feed and fatten as labor becomes impoverished by shylock usurpations.

The bankruptcies of the business of the country unmistakably declare that the volume of money is too small and are appealingly imploring Congress for relief, but unwisely for needed relief by methods

Can any one tell me why the owner of silver bullion, "fit for coinage arposes," should not be permitted to have it coined into standard purposes," should not be permitted to have it coined into standard dollars at the proper expense of the owner, as under the law of 1837 it could be (all the bullion he or they might possess), he being compelled to take the coined dollars away and get rid of them as best he may, except for the reason that such a rule of law or permission under the law would increase the volume of money, and thus increase the value of labor measured in these dollars, the values of the products of labor measured in these dollars and others that might exist to swell the aggregate volume of dollars, the values of lands and their enforcements by labor? Also decrease the values of mortgages, stocks, and bonds measured in these "units" called dollars.

To-day the money-monger feeds his fast horses on cheap oats, his blooded stock on cheap corn and hay; eats sirloin steak, lean ham, and quail; drinks champagne, mint juleps, and mocha; sleeps luxuriously on an inverted hair mattress, patented wire, or swan's-down couch smokes Connecticut seed-leaf, Havana filled, superb triple X cigars; attires daily in silks, fine linen, and broadcloth; domiciles in a palace wrought into existence by labor, and commands labor to supplement his luxurious desires by adorning his palace with the choicest productions of art and science.

To-day labor, that creates all wealth except that granted by the "first Great Cause least understood," is wallowing in the mire of hope, oft-times proving a "Sodom's apple," or drinking in the desperation of strikes, riots, or dynamite, or abandoned to the stolidity of "don't

To-day, the honest advocates of labor's rights in many instances are seeking to remedy the wrongs that the producing forces of our people are suffering under and from by extolling the merits of any and everything as a catholicon, except the right thing, a proper adjustment of the money question nationally.

I aver that there is but one strict criterion by which to determine the olume of money adequate to the proper business necessities of our people. First inquire the net income of wealth to the people of our nation in the aggregate, say for a period of ten years; then divide this result into ten equal parts, each part to represent the net increase for each year; and this last sum to represent the percentage per annum increase net on the sum of wealth each year found to exist; then inquire the prime factors producing such accretion. If we so do, the statistics furnished by reputable statisticians being brought to our aid, I aver we will find the following for the last twenty years: Rate of net inwe will find the following for the last twenty years: Rate of het increase of wealth less than 3 per cent. per annum average (say 3 per cent for easy reckoning). Now comes the question, who or what produces this wealth? We know that the blessings of God, scattered on every hand munificently, even to seeming profligacy in many places, as sunlight, water, soil, &c., is one of the first great factors in the production of wealth.

Labor is another great factor.

Money as an auxiliary in the production of wealth is the third. three-God's gifts, labor, and money-are the only prime factors in the creation of wealth.

Each of these three should receive a just and equitable part of the whole.

Now, let us make such division:

Give to God, in charities and the upbuilding of humanity in all wise ways and by the use of all wise means, say, one-third part or 1 per

Give to labor 1 per cent. Give the money-lender 1 per cent. These three equal the whole.

A whole can not be made of less or more than all its proper parts. But money from the hands of the lender to the borrower is to-day gathering from 3 to 48 per cent. per annum—say a general average of 10 per cent. per annum—say a general average of 10 per cent. per annum more than God's gratis gifts, labor and money together, produce net each year.

This true, it is certain the money-lenders are by such rates absorbing each year not only all the net increase of wealth produced by the forces mentioned but must so absorb of the principal, and would long which they could clutch in the grasp of infernal greed of gain but for the wonderful blessings (?) of bankruptcies, embezzlements, and defal-cations, supplemented by the scythe of time and statutes of limitation, that take frequently the acquisitions of years by usury and strikes a jubilee balance in setting the debtors free.

This condition declares the volume of currency too small.

There are three constitutional methods to blot out this awful crime

First. By a constitutional amendment making it a high crime for any person, by himself or another, directly or indirectly, to bargain for or receive for the use of money a greater rate than 1 per cent. per annum. This is not practicable under existing conditions of public sentiment on the right to skin by usury.

Second. By exercising the high prerogatives with which the Constitution has endowed Congress, judicially affirmed by the United States Supreme Court, to create, and by proper, wise, and patriotic methods put, in course of time, into circulation such a volume of money as that by the law of supply and demand—the general supply so equaling the demand—the rate of interest in the general aggregate would not in the jurisdiction of our Government exceed 1 per cent. per annum. This method is not likely to be adopted, for the money-lenders of the world would combine all their most potential forces to destroy any government by war or otherwise which might so attempt to de-throne them and thus "bring down the rate of usance here with us in Third. Authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to create such a volume of full legal-tender United States dollars—being in addition to the possible volume of metal money with coinage of silver on the same basis as gold—as will supply the demand of each person able to give unquestioned real security for its repayment at the stipulated date, with interest and liquidated damages mentioned to cover all contin-gent costs of enforced collection, and loan the same through the agency of the executive of each State and by him through the agency of some of the executive of each state and by him through the agency of some proper county official to such of the people—the Government in part—as may desire to so borrow, having such unquestionable security to give for its prompt repayment, and at the stable, universal rate of 1 per cent. per annum. This method is not likely to be adopted, for I am certain that the money-lenders, stock-dealers, and money-security venders would "object," and under the rules of Congressional practice such "object," and the dealers of the congressional practice such "object," and the dealers of the congressional practice such "object," and the congressional practice such as the congressional practice such "object," and the congressional practice such "object," object, "object," object, "object," object, "object," object, jection" would be declared good and valid and would obtain.

What are we to do? The great Northwest, the West, Southwest, and South, with their more than abundant natural resources, with millions of intelligent, energetic people, are suffering from a dearth of money volume. We are in the hands of the money-lender; seven-tenths of our wealth-producing possibilities are as though dead, because of a scarcity of money with which to mobilize the industries and render possible to consume all productions.

The money-lenders, watered-stock brokers, and security venders— seculators—are as 3 per cent., while the wealth producers are as 97 per speculators-

The free coinage of silver would aid very much, and I aver that the silver dollar is pre-eminently a domestic dollar.

Who will pretend for a moment, if the coinage of silver was placed on the same footing as that of gold, that the market value of the silver that enters into the makeup of the "standard dollars" would be less than the market value of the gold that enters into the makeup of a gold dollar? I answer, no sensible, honest man. For the moment that gold dollar? I answer, no sensible, honest man. For the moment that free coinage of silver into dollars, present standard, was the law, every owner and holder of silver bullion fit for coinage purposes would say, I now have a market price established in free coinage, and will not sell my bullion for less than I can get at the mints in standard, full legal-tender at par with gold dollars; and, as with gold, I will take them away from the mint and get rid of them as best I can as money, and thus save the Treasury its present burden—under a false and malicious policy—from the necessity of enlarged appropriations for more vault room to keep such additions to the "money volume" from the people.

There are those who advocate putting into the silverdollar sufficient to make it an honest dollar, worth a dollar, intrinsically equal to the gold dollar.

Congress in 1834 wisely and patriotically solved the question of dif-ferences between the market value of bullion metal in the gold and silver dollar by passing an act that the gold dollar coined after that date should contain 6 per cent. less of gold metal than those coined prior to that date. The fathers well knew that the bullion value of the metal entering into the makeup of a metal legal-tender dollar should always be less, and materially less, than the legal value of the dollar so made.

Why not have this Congress learn wisdom from the statesmen of our country and pass a law taking 6 per cent. out of the coinage of all gold dollars coined after this date and thus serve the "king" gold dollar as Christ served Zaccheus of olden time, before he would permit equality of social relations?

The proposition is renewed to have a commission go to the kingdoms of other nations and secure an international standard of gold and silver ago have had under their control and tyrannical dominion all of labor, lands, tenements, money, and the blessings of God (freely granted) of the world." But the foolishness of the proposition is made most apparent when we consider the character of these other governments, and discover that their system of government is wholly inimical to ours. Theirs is the one-man rule by right divine, a monarchy or semi-monarchy; ours, in theory at least, is a government of, by, and for the people. \Therefore these things and conditions that would build up a monarchy and make it strong—in money matters more especially than anything else—would make our Government as a government of, by, and for the people, weak; and if persistently pursued without serious hindrance, would drive us into a monarchy. That which would make our Government of, by, and for the people, strong in peace or war, strong in patriotism to principles, strong in general prosperity, would as surely weaken every government inimical to ours.

To make our Government weak in love of principles, patriotism, and prosperity—and I aver that unwise handling or dealing with the money question will have and irresistibly have more to do with such conditions than all other questions of state importance combined—then we shall have created conditions that will breed nihilism, communism, socialism, and agrarianism; also strikes, riots, and lockouts; but also lay broad, deep, and certain a field for dynamite and the dynamiter. We are certainly approaching the dread and awful time when science in the hands of ignorance, superstition, and outraged right will solve this labor-capital and money-capital problem, unless it be sooner solved by the wisdom, patriotism, and virtues of our national lawmakers in the interest of justice, equity, and humanity.

I here aver that the conditions of the people of a nation keep even step and pace with the volume of money per capita; with a large decrease in the volume of money per capita within the jurisdiction of any crease in the volume of money per capita within the jurisdiction of any government, that population, commerce, arts, wealth, science, and true freedom will in exact ratio disappear; also, that all public spirit, all generous emotions, all the noble aspirations of man will shrivel and disappear until the conditions of life will become universally so hard that individual selfishness will be the only thing consistent with the instinct of self-preservation; and that this will occur as the volume of money shrinks and as prices thereunder must necessarily fall.

Here let me pointedly inquire of the ministry of the church of that Christ who lashed the money-changers out of his temple because they had made of it a den of thieves, as well of the humanitarian and philanthropist, also the business and producing forces of our social and civil society as to-day existing, how long can you afford to indorse the ex-

society as to-day existing, how long can you afford to indorse the existing financial system, which I declare to be of more than national importance, fraught with the weal or woe of uncounted millions; yea, millions unborn, whose welfare both in time and beyond depends on the wisdom of your every word and deed, becoming as they do a part of the woof or warp of the fabrics of life's phases here and perchance

How long can you afford to shut your eyes, your ears, your understandings, your very soul, to the great truths involved in a wise constitutional and patriotic solution practically of this financial question? It is not an easy matter to get religion on an empty stomach, or live it in the fullness and richness of possibilities while the toil-broken back is covered scantily with the coarsest of garb; the home—place where wife and children stay—is desolate of those products of toil that make it a pleasure to designate it as "our home;" or while crucifying circumstances may be patting juba on the spinal column of our richest cumstances may be patting juba on the spinal column of our richest hopes with the flax-hackle of adversity and disaster.

The few days that any of us can stay on the shores of time, with the fact that each of us will soon have to go down into the grave to rot and stink like other paupers, coupled with the fact that none of us can take with us gains our greed has won, that made others so poor indeed, and the other great fact that we must leave to our children and children's children the heritage as a legacy—the very government we help to create, which, as we wisely or unwisely do, will bless or curse them, should inspire each of us to seek the best good of the many by wise legislation, rather than of the few of whom our children and their children are the second to the second the second the second the second the second the second that the second the dren may not be.

Invalid and other Pensions.

SPEECH

HON. JOHN H. ROGERS, OF ARKANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 3, 1885,

On the bill (H. R. 7785) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas, said:
Mr. SPEAKER: I ask leave to read the following extract from the New York Herald, taken from its issue of the 19th or 20th of last month:

REMARKABLE LEGISLATION REGARDING THE FEES OF PENSION ATTORNEYS,

Washington, February 19, 1885.

The House yesterday by a very small majority defeated the consideration of the Senate bill to repeal the pension attorneys' fee act of July 4, 1884, which, it has been shown by the evidence taken before the Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, was lobbied through Congress by the hired counsel of a pension attorney in Washington. This Senate bill has had a remarkable history. The general provisions of it originated at the last session of Congress in the committee mentioned, and first passed the House as an amendment on the pension appropriation bill of that session. Under the rules of the Senate this amendment was stricken out. At this stage the pension attorneys began their work. By some means they succeeded in getting the subcommittee of appropriations to send to the Secretary of the Interior the various bills introduced in the two Houses on this subject and to ask his opinion upon them. By a curious coincidence, about the same time, the paid counsel of the pension attorney fee bill that Congress should adopt.

It so happens that the bill sent by the Secretary of the Interior to the committees of the two Houses is the same bill agreed on in the conference committees of the two Houses, the effect of which permitted an increase of fees in all cases from $10 to $25, and operated retroactively, so as to cover all cases then pending, as well as those to be filed thereafter, and in a very large class of cases permitted new contracts to be filed for $25 in cases in which the full fee under the law had been already paid. It also made the Government an agent to collect unpaid fees in cases already allowed years ago. There were some 300,000 cases pending at the time the law passed, which, at $15, makes $4,500,000 taken by an act of Congress from the pension claimants, to say nothing of a class of cases in which a fee of $25 is allowed after the full fee under existing laws had once been paid. Another remarkable coincidence is that at the very time this bill was in conference the attorney who employed counsel to secure the passage of that act was negotiating for and did purchase the business of another firm of attorneys, controlling about 40,000 claims, with

Mr. Speaker, it is a shame that the truth of this article can not be questioned. On a former day of the present session, I tried to induce this House to repeal the act of July 4, 1884, and to correct the wrongs inflicted upon pension claimants by that act as far as could be done by its repeal and by new legislation. Inexplicably to me, unless it be attributed to a want of information touching either the repealing act or the act sought to be repealed. It was enterprised by diletter we time. attributed to a want of information touching either the repealing act or the act sought to be repealed, I was antagonized by dilatory motions until many members friendly to the bill, but deeply interested in other important legislation then pressing upon the attention of the House, were induced to deny the subject consideration and the repealing act was sent to the Calendar to die. We are now in the closing hours of the session, without time to consider with anything like deliberation bills appropriating millions of money. It is profitless to criticise now this character of legislation or the reasons that have made it necessary. It is enough to know that no honest Representative can approve it or defend it here or elsewhere. defend it here or elsewhere.

In this condition of things no hope can be entertained of correcting the evils flowing from the act of July 4, 1884, so justly criticised in the article just read. But I do not intend that this House shall close its labors until I shall have laid bare before the country the history of the legislation referred to in that article.

On the 20th of June, 1878, Congress passed an act regulating the fees of claim agents and attorneys in pension cases. It fixed the fee at $10 of claim agents and attorneys in pension cases. It fixed the fee at $10 in all cases, and made it payable at any time, leaving the attorney to collect his fee in his own way. Under this law grew up a system of impositions, frauds, and villainies, difficult to believe and hard to describe. Claims utterly worthless, with no semblance of justice, were trumped up and filed, the attorney of course demanding and taking whatever he could get. Flaming advertisements were made the means of inducing the ignorant and unwary to send forward their claims and one, two, or five dollars as they could raise or afford.

Ex-Commissioner Dudley, many whose testimony I have in view of Ex-Commissioner Dudley, upon whose testimony I hope, in view of recent events, I may not have to rely for much that I say, testified before the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back-Pay, of which I am a member, that "in point of fact, agents of this character filed a great many cases for confederate soldiers. They would file a case for anybody that they could get to make a claim, their object being merely to get the $10."

His testimon was componented by the Secretary of the Interior

His testimony was corroborated by the Secretary of the Interior, when a witness before our committee.

The effect of all this was to choke the Pension Office. It could not cope with the flood of false and fraudulent claims that came in. It also tended to drive reputable attorneys from the business.

Our committee set to work early in the last session to correct this evil. Aided by the Commissioner of Pensions and some reputable attorneys of this city was took around a varning carefully into the whole neys of this city we took proof and examined carefully into the whole subject. As the result we formulated a bill which met the approbastude to the result we formulated a bill which her the approxi-tion of this House almost without a dissenting vote. It passed as an amendment to the pension appropriation bill of last session. Under the rules of the Senate it was stricken out of the bill. Mr. Speaker, that bill met substantially the approbation of the then Commissioner of Pensions, as his testimony will show; and at least one reputable attorney of this city, claiming to represent partially at least the respectable element of his profession, conceded that it was all that the respectable element of his profession, conceded that it was all that could be reasonably hoped for, and seemed satisfied. But there was one man at least who was not satisfied. He was a pension attorney. He controlled the largest pension business in this city or any other. He has according to his own testimony between 125,000 and 150,000 claims, good, bad, and indifferent. He was the owner of the National Tribune, a newspaper published in this city with a circulation of 112,000 subscribers, devoted, if he is to be believed, to "historical questions and to the interests of the soldiers." He is reputed to be rich and to have made it in the pension business. He was interested, deeply inhave made it in the pension business. He was interested, deeply in-terested, in the pension legislation. No sooner had the Senate stricken out the House amendment to the pension appropriation bill of which I have spoken than he began his work. He began it in a business way—like a man of experience, like a man who wanted something and was willing to pay for it. He employed counsel, able counsel, experienced lawyers and legislators, and at a cost of $3,500 to aid him in promoting his interests. ing his interests.

Just how counsel earned the $3,500 does not appear; that he got value received is admitted.

It does appear, however, from the testimony, that this agent and his counsel called upon the subcommittees of the two Houses having in charge the pension appropriation bill, and who were subsequently appointed upon the conference committees to consider that bill, and induced them to send the various bills on the subject of fees for pension agents to the Secretary of the Interior and to ask his opinion as to the merits of the respective bills. It likewise appears that no sooner was that done than this same pension attorney and his counsel were on hand to argue ex parte the bill they wanted, and it also appears that the bill they advocated the Secretary recommended to the committees of the two Houses and it became a law on the 4th day of July, 1884. It is also true that the bill as it passed never saw the light in either House until it came in on a conference report during the last days of the session, and, so far as I know, passed without any member of Congress except the conference committees being aware that it was not the amendment which had previously passed the House. Such is the origin and history of the passage of the act of July 4, 1884.

Mr. Speaker, the investigation does not warrant the slightest belief that anything wrong was intended by the committees of conference. I am persuaded that they did not suspect any evil, or dream that they were being entrapped. Sir, I do not think there is anything in the testimony to satisfy a reasonable mind that the Secretary of the Interior was advised that the action of the subcommittee, in sending the bills to him and soliciting his opinion was not voluntary on their part. agents to the Secretary of the Interior and to ask his opinion as to the bills to him and soliciting his opinion was not voluntary on their part.

He denies all complicity in the action had by the pension agent and his attorneys in procuring the bills sent to him. He admits that they appeared and argued the subject before him; denies that it made any deep impression upon him. But nevertheless they got what they wanted. The pension attorney testified, "I was entirely satisfied with it," meaning the act of July 4, 1884, which was the bill the Secretary had recommended. Sir, it is highly probable that the pension attorney knew in advance what the Secretary's views on the subject were, for it appears in proof that while in the Senate he was on the Pension Committee and had favored substantially the same bill without some Committee and had favored substantially the same bill without some

Mr. Speaker, the facts I have stated rest on the testimony of the Secretary of the Interior himself and the testimony of George E. Lemon, the pension attorney heretofore referred to. Let any one who doubts any part of this statement read the testimony of these witnesses and be satisfied. Mr. Speaker, it is to be regretted that truth demands that I shall disclose another chapter of the history of this act; and in doing so I shall rely on the testimony of two witnesses only, namely, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Joslyn, and George E. Lemon. It will be remembered in this connection that under the regulations of the Interior Department all matters touching pensions were referred to the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, and that he decided all appeals from the Commissioner of Pensions, and, in a word, had supervisory ju-risdiction over that bureau. The Secretary often signed the orders and decisions, but he did so in a perfunctory way, and without question, relying upon the Assistant Secretary for the correct management of that bureau.

It appears from the evidence of the Assistant Secretary and George E. Lemon that for a long time prior to the passage of the act of July 4, 1884, a firm of attorneys, which we will call, for convenience, "The Fitzgeralds," for reasons not important to this discussion, had been suspended from practice in pension cases; that they controlled a very large business, say from 35,000 to 75,000 cases, good, bad, and indifferent; that a large part of this business affecting the interests of their clients was absolutely blocked in the December 11 of it perhaps in clients was absolutely blocked in the Department, all of it perhaps imperiled, and the Pension Bureau greatly embarrassed thereby. George E. Lemon had for months been negotiating for the purchase of this business

One of the obstacles to the purchase was the fact that "the Fitzger-alds" were suspended, and the practice of the Department was not to recognize the purchaser of the business of a suspended attorney. Upon just what principle of law or common sense this practice was made to rest it would puzzle a lawyer to tell. But it is nevertheless true, and the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Joslyn, says that Fitzgerald was restored to practice that he might sell to Lemon. True, the Secretary who made that order denied it, and the Assistant Secretary failed to explain. the contradiction. The order was made on the 16th of June. The bills sent to the Secretary by the subcommittees were sent on the 9th of June, and on the day following the restoration of Fitzgerald the Secretary sent the bill he recommended to the subcommittees, which ten days later was favorably reported from the conference committees of the two Houses, and became a law July 4 following.

While the subject was under consideration Lemon and his attorney appeared and presented their objections to the House amendment and presented their own views. When the Secretary had decided the matter and sent the bill to the subcommittee Lemon called again and the Secretary says he thinks he gave him a draft of the bill. The Assistant Secretary says he thinks he gave him a draft of the bill. The Assistant Secretary must have known what had been done. He does not admit it nor deny it, but rather evades it. But "the Fitzgeralds" were in darkness, total darkness, of all that was going on. On the 20th of June that order restoring "the Fitzgeralds" was published by the Commissioner of Pensions. Then they could sell. What followed? On the 24th of June "the Fitzgeralds" agreed with Lemon upon terms of sale, and a written memorandum was made and placed in the hands of an attorney to prepare the papers. The papers were not ready for execution until the evening of the 26th, the very day the Secretary's hill was agreed upon in conference; for it was reported to the two bill was agreed upon in conference; for it was reported to the two Houses on the morning of the 27th of June. I quote the testimony of Mr. Lemon, in response to questions put by myself, on this point:

Q. Since that law was passed have you not largely increased your business?
A. No; I do not think so.
Q. Have you not made purchases of claims from other pension agents?
A. No, sir; I have refused a large number of cases since the passage of that law.

Q. About the time of the passage of the law, or just before it, did you not buy out the business of other firms here?
A. Yes; I did last June, and I am sorry that I did so.
Q. Was that before or after the passage of the law?
A. It was before the passage of the law?
A. It wo long before the passage of the law?
A. I think the purchase took effect on the 24th day of June, 1884, and the law was approved on July 4.
Q. Did you know where the act referred to was at the time you made this purchase—whether in the House, or in the Senate, or in the conference committee?

A. I think it was in conference committee. I am not sure about that. Of ourse I knew all about the progress of that legislation and everything concern-

Q. Did you call on any members of the House or of the Senate in connection with it?

A. Yes, sir; on a large number of them.
Q. Did you recommend any modification of the act as it had passed the House?
A. Yes; because there were several features in that bill that ought never to ave passed the House.

True, Mr. Lemon subsequently, on page 130 of the printed evidence, after consulting as he says with his attorney, attempted to modify this evidence; but I submit its truth remains unshaken. In his efforts to get rid of this damaging evidence he was driven to contradict the Secget rid of this damaging evidence he was driven to contradict the Secretary of the Interior and himself as well, where he says on page 130 that "the first time I saw the text of this bill I saw it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 23, 1884." For on page 106 the Secretary says that after Lemon and his attorney had appeared and stated their views and he had considered the subject and sent his bill to the subcommittees, that Lemon called again, and he, the Secretary, gave him, he thinks, "a copy of this same draught of the bill which I sent to Mr. he thinks, 'FOLLETT."

So Lemon did call and ascertain what had been done. Lemon, on page 130, was finally forced to admit that this sale was consummated on the evening of the 26th of June, between 2 and 4 o'clock, the very day the Teller bill was agreed on in conference, i. e., the bill of sale by Fitzgerald to Lemon was executed, the money paid, and the pen-sion cases of Fitzgerald delivered to Lemon, and the same at once taken to the latter's office the very evening of the day the conference committees of the two Houses agreed to report favorably the Teller bill. It is certainly true, as Mr. Lemon says, that he knew "all about the progress of that legislation and everything concerning it."

One other significant fact just here; mark it well. From the 24th to the 26th of June, the time when this sale was being consummated, the Fitzgeralds' mail, by a written agreement then on file in the post-office of this city, was tied up, to be delivered to Lemon when the sale was consummated. How cunningly devised was this scheme; the pre-tense was that the purchaser was entitled to everything going through the mail to Fitzgerald after the 24th of June. Truly were the Fitzthe mail to Fitzgerald after the 24th of June. Truly were the Fitzgeralds in the dark. Even the ordinary channels of information had been shrewdly closed to them. They had agreed to sell and further information on the pension business did not interest them. They awaited calmly the consummation of their contract, no doubt glad of the promised relief a sale would bring. If any one enjoys human misery, let him read the evidence of George E. Lemon, on pages 130 to 134, inclusive, where he tries to defend his conduct and reconcile it with the principles of honesty and sound morals. He presents at once a shameful and a shameless spectacle.

But this is not all. The story does not stop here. On page 134 Mr.

Lemon testifies that the execution of the contracts by the Fitzgeralds and the payment of the money to them occurred between 2 and 4 o'clock on the evening of the 26th of June; that he had ordered the wagons to on the evening of the 26th of June; that he had ordered the wagons to be on hand, and they were ready at Fitzgerald's office. Even this precaution was had. Why this indecent haste? He knew, Mr. Speaker, the importance of fastening his clutches upon Fitzgerald's business before the industrious newspaper men had sent their morning editions to every breakfast table. He was a newspaper man himself—the proprietor of a newspaper devoted "to historical questions and the interests of the soldiers.

of the soldiers."

Sure enough, the Star of this city, next day, gave notice that the conference committees had agreed to report favorably the Secretary's bill.

Lemon testifies to this himself, on page 130, and I presume that is true.

How he must have chuckled over the success of his work on the morning of the 27th of June. Thousands had slipped from the Fitzgeralds into his pockets, as cleverly as if done by the trick of a juggler. What honest man can suppress the hope that in some way he may be brought to understand "that nothing is so foolish as cunning?"

But, Mr. Speaker, one step further. On the very day of this sale, before 4 o'clock, when the Departments close, Mr. Joslyn, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, at the solicitation of Lemon, prepared and the Secretary signed and issued this order:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, June 26, 1884

Sin: Herewith is transmitted to you a power of attorney m. W. Fitzgerald, N. W. Fitzgerald & Co., S. C. Fitzgerald, and W. T. Fitzgerald, to George E. Lemon, and a letter of withdrawal of said parties and firm as pension attorneys, which, under the circumstances and the good standing of George E. Lemon, are approved by me.

You will therefore recognize George E. Lemon as attorney in all cases heretofore represented by said parties and firm, according to the terms of the papers herewith filed with you.

And in all cases of transfer from one attorney to another you will recognize such contracts as they may make touching attorneys' fees, &c. It is not material whether the attorneys' fees are paid to the original or substituted attorney, provided only one payment is made by the United States pension agent.

Very respectfully,

H. M. TELLER, Secretary

The COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS.

Here is the contract, or the paper referred to in that order or letter of the Secretary:

Articles of agreement made and entered into at Washington, District of Columbia, on this 24th day of June, A. D. 1884, by and between George E. Lemon, of the first part, and W. T. Fitzgerald, S. C. Fitzgerald, N. W. Fitzgerald, and N. W. Fitzgerald & Co., of Washington, D. C., of the second part, witnesseth:

Articles of agreement made and entered into at Washington, District of Columbia, on this 24th day of June, A. D. 1831, by and between George E. Lemon, of the first part, and W. T. Fitzgerald, S. C. Fitzgerald, N. W. Fitzgerald, and N. W. Fitzgerald & Co., of Washington, D. On this 24th day of June, 1884, personally appeared before me George E.

Lemon, N. W. Fitzgerald, N. W. Fitzgerald, of N. W. Fitzgerald & Co., S. C.

Fitzgerald, for himself and as attorney for W.T. Fitzgerald, and acknowledged the foregoing contract, power of substitution and attorney to be the voluntary act of them, and each of them, and of the said firm and of the said W. T. Fitzgerald for the purposes herein stated.

Witness my hand and seal at Washington, D. C., the day and year first above written.

M. M. ROHRER, Notary Public.

In view of the circumstances these are remarkable documents. Lemon went alone when he got this order. It does not appear that he had ever previously mentioned the order to the Assistant Secretary, nor does it appear that the Secretary had known the pendency of negotiations for Lemon's purchase of Fitzgerald's business. But the Assistant Secretary knew it, for he testifies Fitzgerald was restored to practice that he might make the sale. Whatever may be the truth of this, Lemon got the order, and when he got it the contract referred to in it was not drafted. It was then in process of being drafted. Neither the Secretary nor the Assistant Secretary had ever seen it. This is admitted by them all.

Mr. Speaker, the haste was indecent, and the order in full keeping with the other facts I have detailed touching this scheme. It was quick work. There was no departmental red tape about it.

If it were done, when 'tis done, 'twere well It were done quickly.

It were done quickly.

For if not done quickly, if delayed a day, or two days at most, the world could have known of the agreement by the conference committee to report the act of July 4, 1884, to which the attention of Congress might have been particularly called, and the bill defeated, or the authority of the Secretary invoked to defeat this fraudulent scheme.

I leave the Assistant Secretary and Mr. Lemon, and his attorneys too, where the facts leave them, and without comment.

It does appear, from the Secretary's evidence, that while he signed the order referred to he relied on his assistant and knew nothing of what lay beneath the order he was induced to senetion.

what lay beneath the order he was induced to sanction.

Mr. Speaker, in these facts is to be found the interest of George E.

Lemon in the passage of the act of July 4, 1884. Truly is he the soldier's friend. Indeed, he is himself "an old soldier."

It did not take long, Mr. Speaker, for this extraordinary order of the Secretary, when applied to the bill of sale from Fitzgerald to Lemon, to get the Pension Office in hot water, as this correspondence will show:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE, Washington, July 14, 1884.

Sir: Referring to your letter of the 26th ultimo, transmitting the power of attorney from N. W. Fitzgerald, N. W. Fitzgerald & Co., S. C. Fitzgerald, and W.T. Fitzgerald, to George E. Lemon, I have the honor to invite your attention to the following facts:

1. In many instances the claimants object to the transfer, and desire to select their own agent, or prosecute their claims without such aid.

2. It appears in many claims that the Messrs. Fitzgeralds have been paid the fee, either in part or in full, and wherein there is nothing else for Mr. Lemon or any other agent to do, the claims being complete at the date of the transfer. Is it intended, as is held by Mr. Lemon, that he should be recognized in despite of the expressed wish of the claimants, and is it your intention that in the second class of claims mentioned that Mr. Lemon is to be paid the fee notwithstanding the claim is complete and the claimant has paid Fitzgerald & Co.?

This letter is written in pursuance of our conversation of Friday last, in order that a full expression of your views upon the subject may be given for the guidance of the office.

Very respectfully,

W. W. DUDLEY, Commissioner.

W. W. DUDLEY, Commissioner.

Hon. H. M. TELLER, Secretary of the Interior.

Order 103.]

Department of the Interior, Pension Office,

Washington, D. C., July 30, 1894.

The following instructions of the honorable Secretary, of the 17th instant, in regard to payment of fees and transfer of business by one attorney to another, are published for the information and guidance of the office.

W. W. DUDLEY, Commissioner.

Sir: I have yours of the 14th instant concerning the collection of attorneys' fees in case of the assignment of business by one attorney to another. It was not my intention in allowing one attorney to transfer his business to another to allow additional fees to be collected for work completed and when the fee had been paid. In all cases where the work is but partially completed it will be impossible to determine what ought to be paid to the new attorney, and I must, therefore, leave the fee to be paid as the law directs.

If an attorney who has partially completed the work of a pension case and received his pay therefor, in whole or in part, refuses to complete the work so be gun, he can not be compelled to do so, although for such misconduct he may be disbarred; but if he discontinues to practice, the Department is powerless to compel him to proceed or to punish him for neglecting to do so. If he assigns his business to another attorney, the claimant is not bound to recognize the assignee as his attorney; he may employ other persons to present his claim, and the assignee so receiving the papers of claimant from the former attorney will be required by the Department to turn over to such claimant, on demand, any and all papers in his hands belonging to such claimant. But if the claimant chooses to recognize the assignee as his attorney, then he is bound to pay to such attorney the legal fee for his services, unless an agreement shall be made between the claimant and the assignee for a fee less than that established by law. When the claimant has paid a portion only of the fee allowed by law, and only a portion of the work necessary to secure the pension has been performed by the attorney, it would seem to be but just that the assignee should be paid only for the work done by him; but it is impossible to determine the amount that ought to be paid for the services rendered by such assignee, and, therefore, I see no way but to allow the assignee to receive pay in all cases where he is required to do substantial service to his client. He should not be allowed to render service simply as a means of making a charge in cases completed by the assignor. Whenever the claimant has paid nothing, as I have before said, he should be required to pay the assignee whether he has rendered service or not, because the former attorney or assignment of claims held by one attorney and in an incompleted state should not be allowed, except in such cases as appear to the Department to be necessary to the proper conduct of such cases in the interest of the claimant.

Very respectfully,

Hon. W. W. Dudley,

H. M. TELLER, Secretary.

Hon. W. W. Dudley, Commissioner of Pensions.

This letter of explanation needs explanation. It is as clear as mud. The Assistant Secretary so found it when he tried and failed to explain it. The Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Clark, tried it and he failed to make it very clear, and differed widely with the Assistant Secretary as to what the Secretary intended. The Secretary construed it to his en-tire satisfaction; but it would have been more creditable to his clever capabilities and amiable character if he had modestly declined.

I am not disposed to follow this branch of the subject further. must read the evidence to enjoy the confusion of ideas that prevailed when the committee were seeking light on this transfer and these or-

It is enough to say that the Department had never before denied a claimant under similar circumstances the right to select his own at-

I have recited these facts for a twofold purpose: First, to put the country upon notice how disinterested and tender is the affection of the chief pension attorney of this city for the soldier, and to gratuitously furnish him an article of an "historical nature," which the 112,000 subscribers of his newspaper will read with some interest perhaps, if not with pleasure. Of course nothing of "interest to the soldiers or historical in its nature," will escape so enterprising a gentleman and disinterested a philanthropist as he.

In the second place, this recital demonstrates how easy it is for us, in the faithful discharge of public duty, to innocently be made the instruments of the grossest wrong toward those we are bound by every principle of justice and fair dealing to protect.

I now turn to the act of July 4, 1884, that I may point out the iniquitous operation of that law, and how Lemon profited by it. When that act became a law there was on file in the Pension Office about 300,000 cases. These cases had been filed under the act of 1870 and the act of June, 20, 1878. A very large number had been filed under the latter act, the fee allowed being $10, and the attorney compelled to collect the fee as he could. Many of the fees in these cases had been paid in full; some, perhaps almost all, in part. The attorneys had paid in full; some, perhaps almost all, in part. The attorneys had taken these claims under existing laws and agreed to do the work for that sum or less. The law forbade a greater fee than $10, and a contract for a greater sum would have been void.

In thousands of cases the work had been substantially done; in many instances decisions had been made and nothing left but for the Secretary to sign the certificates of allowance. In many cases under the latter act the certificates had been signed by the Secretary and the claimart had been drawing the pension for years, but in many instances had not paid all the attorney fees. The Department took no notice of the fees under the act of 1878, and its records showed nothing upon that subject. The certificate or check was given to the claimant and the Department had nothing to do with attorney fees. That was a matter for the attorney and his client to settle.

Such was the condition of things when the act of July 4, 1884, went into effect.

That act so changed the law as to allow an increase of fee of $15 in all cases pending, as well as to be thereafter filed, and it made it the duty of the Government to collect out of the first installment due the duty of the Government to collect out of the list installment due the claimant all the fee not then paid in all cases disposed of or to be disposed of and to pay the same to the attorneys of record.

True, the additional $15 could only be paid to the attorney when he procured a contract from his client to that effect. True, also, by the terms of the act the client could not be compensed to one needs only to read the evidence to see to what duress these poor one needs only to read the evidence to see to what duress these poor one needs only to read the evidence to procure these contracts. The terms of the act the client could not be compelled to execute it; but and helpless people were subjected to procure these contracts. The law went into effect July 4, 1884. On January 15 following Lemon testified (see page 20) that he had secured 25,000 of the contracts. Assuming these 25,000 claims will be allowed, his clear profit at $15 a case is $375,000.

I hold, Mr. Speaker, that every one of these contracts is void for want of consideration. If I agree to defend a suit for you or to build you a house for a thousand dollars, and the work is begun and you come to me and without any new undertaking moving from me simply promise me a thousand dollars additional when I get through, the promise is void and you can not enforce it in a court of justice. It is just as void as if standing in my place I promise without consideration to give you my homestead to-morrow and execute to you a deed for it. There is no consideration to support the promise, and yet the Department has recognized this law and these contracts and has already paid out many thousands of dollars to pension agents, taken from the claimants who not only needed it but were justly entitled to it. How they procured these contracts may me seen by reading these circulars:

POSTAL CARD.

(Address:) Mrs. Geo. A. Matchett, Marietta, Ohio.

Memorandum from George E. Lemon, counselor at law and solicitor of patents and claims, 615 Fifteenth street N. W., Washington, D. C., P. O. Drawer 325.

Why do you not execute and return the articles of agreement or state your casons for not doing so? Very few of my clients have failed to execute the conacts as authorized by law.

Please comply with my request by promptly executing both of the articles of greement, and return them to me at once.

Let me hear from you by return mail, and oblige,

GEORGE E LEMON.

GEORGE E. LEMON.

Q. Is this [handing another card to witness] another of those circulars? A. Yes; that postal card must have been sent from the office; but we make a distinction between postal cards and circulars.

The card was put in evidence, and is as follows:

POSTAL CARD.

(Address:) Mr. William H. Raynor, Freeport, Queens County, N. Y.

Memorandum from George E. Lemon, counselor at law and solicitor of patents and claims, 615 Fifteenth street, N. W., Washington, D. C., P. O. drawer —.

All the papers in your pension case were transferred to me by Fitzgerald & Co., and with the approval of the honorable the Secretary of the Interior, as you

Co., and with the approval of the honorable the Secretary of the Interior, as you have heretofore been notified.

You have as yet failed to execute and return the articles of agreement (authorized by law) which I sent you some time ago. Why have you not returned them? Both of the articles should be executed and returned to me.

Please attend to this at once, and let me hear from you by return mail.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE E. LEMON.

GEORGE E. LEMON.

The chairman also put in evidence the following cards:

POSTAL CARD.

(Address:) Humphrey Burfield, Layman, Washington County, Ohio.

Why have you failed to execute the agreements which I sent you as to the fee authorized by law? They are the forms approved by the Department. Both articles should be executed and returned to me at once to be filed in the Pension Office. No fee can be paid me unless the Commissioner so directs. Please do this without delay. See circular and copy of the law sent you.

Yours, truly,

CINCINNATI, OHIO, January, 1885.

A. W. McCORMICK.

Remember, both "fee agreements," inclosed herewith, must be executed and returned promptly to us, in accordance with the requirements of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Very respectfully,

SOULÉ & CO.

These are samples of their methods of procuring contracts under this

Who will say that there is no duress and no wrong in this? Who will stand up and defend this wrong? Who, with a full knowledge of the facts, would have filibustered to defeat the consideration of a bill to repeal this act and restore the pension claimants to their rights? Mr. Speaker, I have now in my mind's eye a man who now resides in my district, a man who belongs to the command of your distinguished colleague on this side, General Wolford, who has in every instance stood by the interests of pension claimants, and who would suffer his right arm amputated before he would sanction this act—a man with a wife and five children, a man on crutches, paralyzed from his hips down, and who has a claim pending for a pension.

Let us take him as an example and assume a case of this sort. In his destitution and want he clings to the hope that his pension will come sooner or later. He has struggled and gotten all the evidence he could. He scratches about and pays $2 or $3, perhaps the $10 due under the act of 1878. His case is ready for adjudication. It is perhaps adjudicated, but the certificate not issued. Just at this juncture comes the act of 1884. Atonce his attorney sends one of these contracts with one of these circulars. Would he hesitate? He does not know the condition of his claim. He reads this peremptory circular from his attorneys. He says to himself: "I have done all I agreed. He ought not to demand it of me, but I am hungry and naked, my little ones are gaunt and cold. It will do me no good if I don't get it soon; perhaps it will do them no good either. If I do not sign it I may never get it; a half loaf is better than no bread." And he signs it and returns it. Who would take that money? No one, unless it be that class of lawyers his destitution and want he clings to the hope that his pension will would take that money? No one, unless it be that class of lawyers

Who feed on crime and fatten on distress, And wring vile mirth from suffering's last excess.

No man can tell how many such cases as this have occurred. But suppose that contracts are obtained in the 300,000 cases now pending, the great majority of which sooner or later you and I know will be allowed. What does it amount to at $15 per case? The round sum of $4,500,000. If half are allowed, it foots $2,250,000. But this is not all. It is shown in proof, admitted by the Secretary of the Interior, that in cases of transfers like that of Fitzgerald to Lemon the assignee can disregard the contracts between the assignor and his client and make a new contract and get the $25, and such has been the practice under this act. Read his evidence on page 120 to that effect.

But another feature of this act is that it makes the Government take a large part of its force in the Pension Office from its legitimate work, and put it to tracing down the amount of fees paid under the act of 1878, and to the collection of the unpaid attorney's fees and the payment of the same to the attorneys, and this not only in cases undisposed of but in cases disposed of years before the law was passed. It is supposed that 5 per cent. of the office are engaged in this work, and it must continue while there is a case undisposed of which was filed under the act of 1878.

The thing resolves itself into this: Three hundred thousand claim-The thing resolves itself into this: Three hundred thousand claimants are asking the Department to adjudicate their claims, now long delayed because the Pension Office is behind in its work. The Department replies, "We will do the best we can for you, but under the law we shall have to stop a large part of the force to collect and pay over fees to the attorneys who represent you; not fees which you justly owe, it is true, but fees which Congress has made it our duty to take from you and give to them. You must wait until this can be done." That is the simple, naked truth.

Mr. Speaker, it is due the Secretary of the Interior that while he frankly took upon himself the paternity of this unjust law he did not understand that its operation would be as I have stated, nor did he know that such had been the practice until his attention, while a witness before our committee, was called to it. To be more specific, he ness before our committee, was called to it. To be more specific, he did know that the act operated retroactively, so as to allow an additional fee of $15 in all cases and to make it the duty of the Government to collect and pay over the attorneys' fees in all cases not disposed of; that was bad enough; but he did not know that the Government was compelled to collect the fees in cases disposed of when the act went into effect. He did not know that the Government was made an went into effect. He did not know that the Government was made an agent at its own expense, and the delay of other claims, to ascertain and collect stale attorneys' fees from its own pensioners.

That there may be no mistake about this I quote from the Secretary evidence-first on pages 106, 107, and 108:

evidence—first on pages 106, 107, and 108:

The Chairman. I think you have stated that this provision was your own recommendation—"that in all claims allowed since June 20, 1878, where it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Pensions that the fee of $10, or any part thereof, has not been paid, he shall cause the same to be deducted from the pension, and the pension agent to pay the same to the recognized attorney"?

The Secretary. Yes; that is my own recommendation.

The Chairman. Does not that require the Government to employ part of the clerical force of the Pension Office to go back over claims that have been allowed, and in which certificates had been issued, and deduct the fee from the pension which the pensioner is already receiving?

The Secretary. Oh, no; not at all.

The Chairman. Is not that the practice of the Pension Office, under it?

The Secretary. If it is, it is in violation of the statute. There is no authority for it under that law. The law refers to cases thereafter adjudicated. I saw no reason why an attorney who had conducted a case successfully for a fee of $10 should not be paid his fee by the Government the same as an attorney who had conducted one successfully for $25. I see none now. I think it is in the interest of the administration of the Pension Office and in the interest of justice that it should be done. But that does not justify the Pension Office in going back and saying to a claimant who got his certificate last year, "You owe this attorney $10." If the Pension Office has given that construction to the law it has made a mistake.

The Chairman. But the language is "that in all claims allowed since June
The Chairman. But the language is "that in all claims allowed since June $10." If the Pension Office has given that construction to the law it has made a mistake.

The CRAIRMAN. But the language is, "that in all claims allowed since June 20, 1878." where it shall appear that the fee of $10 has not been paid it shall be deducted from the pension.

The SECRETARY. That simply means all cases that were allowed and the certificates not yet issued. Cases are sometimes allowed a long time before they are finally settled. That is all that it means. That was its purpose and intention. I do not know what the Pension Office may have done under it.

The CHAIRMAN. You have read the testimony of the Commissioner of Pensions before the committee, have you not?

The SECRETARY. Not on that point. My attention was not called to it. I never heard it said before that such a construction could be put upon the law. Certainly that was not my intention, and that is not what I think the statute means.

Certainly that was not my intention, and that is not what I think the statute means.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your interpretation of the statute, then?

The SECRETARY. Simply that hereafter in all cases allowed but not settled (for instance when a claim is allowed the certificate does not issue for some time), instead of issuing a check for the full amount, the pension agent shall deduct the fee due to the attorney. But I never understood that, where a case was allowed and settled by the certificate going to the claimant the Pension Office would go back and deduct the attorney's fee.

The CHAIRMAN. And you are not aware that this is the practice of the Pension Office?

The CHAIRMAN. And you are not aware that this is the practice of the Pension Office?

The Secretary. I am not aware that there ever has been such a practice. Certainly my attention has never been called to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the law of July 4, 1884, if an attorney comes to the Pension Office with a contract from the claimant in a claim which is completed as to all the testimony (complete as to everything except the issue of the certificate), he is allowed, is he not, to attach that contract to such a claim and receive $15 more, even if the full $10 fee allowed under the act of 1878 has been already paid?

The Secretary. I should think it likely that if a claimant, before a final adjudication of the claim, before the final determination of it (which is, as I understand, when the certificate goes out), sees fit to enter into a contract with an attorney to pay him a fee of $25, the Pension Office is bound to allow that fee to be deducted, provided the claimant had not paid any portion of the $10 fee.

The CHAIRMAN. But suppose he had paid the whole $10 fee?

The Secretary. Then probably he might make a contract, and the Pension Office might pay the attorney $15 more.

The CHAIRMAN. And that would attach, would it not, to a claim, although complete as to all the evidence, if the certificate had not been signed by the Secretary?

The Secretary. Very likely that is so, but I do not suppose that it would go back to a case in which the certificate had been signed. I do not suppose the Pension Office would recognize a contract of that kind. That would be the case that you first suggested.

The CHAIRMAN, Yes; as to the $10 fee. In the case that I first suggested no contract is needed. Now, take another class of cases where claims filed under the act of 1878 were not completed in the matter of testimony, but on which, under the act of 1878, the whole or a part of the fee of $10 had been collected. Does not this law permit in such cases a new contract to be filed for $25, and the whole $25 to be paid out of the pension?

The Secretary. Do you mean in addition to the $107

The CHAIRMAN. In addition to the $10, or to any part of it that may have been paid.

The Secretary. I do not understand so paid.

The Secretary. I do not understand so.
The Chairman. Do you not understand that to be the practice of the Pension Office, at any rate in cases where a new attorney has been employed?
The Secretary. Very likely. When a new attorney comes in the Pension Office has not any control over the contract. Take the case of Mr. Fitzgerald. Suppose that Mr. Fitzgerald had received $10 in a case, and then he turns over his business to some other attorney. A claimant may make a contract with that attorney, and, of course, the Pension Office could not prevent that attorney getting his money. If the Pension Office should undertake to do that it would be saying to the claimant that he could not pay the proper amount that he is entitled to pay.

The Chairman. In such cases as I last referred to, suppose one attorney is substituted for another, and suppose the substituted attorney obtains a contract for $25 in cases where the whole or a part of the $10 fee had been paid. Would not the substituted attorney in such cases be allowed to receive the full $25?

The Secretary. That would depend upon the contract which the parties made.

The SECRETARY. That would depend upon the contract which the parties made.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean the contract between the assignor attorney and the assignee attorney?

The SECRETARY. No; but the contract between the claimant and the substituted attorney. The substituted attorney could not receive a $25 fee unless the claimant made a contract with him to that effect.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, if a substituted attorney makes a contract with a claimant for the whole $25 under the law, although he had previously paid a fee of $10, he is allowed to receive the whole $25, is he not?

The SECRETARY. Under the present act the claimant has notany right to pay any money to his attorney until there is a completion of the claim. Consequently, when he makes a contract he does not pay his attorney $10, and he can not do it. The attorney has not any right to take any money from the claimant until the completion of the case. If Mr. Fitzgerald or Mr. Lemon makes a contract with Mr. Jones to prosecute his claim and afterwards turns that contract over to John Smith, there has been no money paid under that contract, and then turn over the case to another attorney and allow him to milk the claimant also, and then the second attorney to turn it over to a new man, and so on.

The CHAIRMAN. But where an attorney has milked a claimant under the act of 1878, a new attorney is now allowed under the act of 1884 to come in and milk him again, is he not, if he makes a contract?

The SECRETARY. Yes, if he makes a contract. Under the old system one attorney could get $10 out of a claimant and could then throw up the case, go away, and abandon it. The claimant and could then throw up the case, go away, and abandon it. The claimant and could then throw up the case, go away, and abandon it. The claimant would get another attorney, who would take another $10, and who would in his turn go away, and so on ad infinitum. Now that can not be done. That is why I objected to the old law. It gave too many opportunities for fraud.

The CHAIRMAN. About how ma

port.
The Chairman. I believe there were about 300,000 cases on file.
The Secretary. The Commissioner of Pensions can tell as to that. I would not venture to fix any figure.
The Chairman. Then this law which you recommended was made retroactive, was it not, to the extent of covering all the claims on file in the Pension Office that were filed under the act of 1878?
The Secretary. Provided that the claimant (who is supposed to have some sense in the matter always) saw fit to enter into a contract.

That evidence was given on the 29th of January last. On the following day (page 110) the Secretary testified as follows:

By Mr. ROGERS:

By Mr. ROGERS:

Q. You have stated that you had received the pension appropriation bill of the House when you prepared the bill which has become the law of July 4, 1884. Am I right in that?

A. I have no recollection of having received it; but, judging from my letter to Mr. FOLLETT, I must have had it, because I say in that letter that I have seen it. I have no distinct recollection of having it.

Q. You say, in answer to Mr. FOLLETT, that you have read that bill?

A. Yes.

Q. Turn to the bottom of your letter to Mr. FOLLETT and look at the last paragraph or two. Do you not find there that you state you have given the two bills careful examination?

A. Yes.

- A. Yes.
 Q. You were aware, then, that this bill of the House did not permit pension attorneys who had undertaken to prosecute claims under the act of 1878 at $10 fee per case to make contracts in that class of claims, and to get $15 fee additional?
 A. Yes; I think that that is so.
 Q. You have stated that your bill did allow contracts to be made in that class of cases for the $15 additional fee.
 A. I not only said so, but I think the bill itself shows it.
 Q. Did you intend that it should operate in that way when you drafted the bill?
 A. I intended that in every case which was not settled—which was still in-

Q. Did you intend that it should operate in that way when you drafted the bill?

A. I intended that in every case which was not settled—which was still incomplete—the parties, if they saw fit to make a contract to give an additional $15, might do so. I did that ex industria, because I believed that to be in the interest of the soldier.

Q. Did you consult with Mr. Joslyn about your draught of the bill when it was under consideration, or after it was prepared, and before it was sent to the conference committee?

A. I do not think I did.

Q. Did you consult with any one else besides Mr. Lemon's attorneys, and if so, with whom?

A. I did not consult with Mr. Lemon's attorneys. Mr. Lemon's attorneys came to me and had their say, whatever it was. I then proceeded to prepare this bill myself after hearing their views on the subject.

Q. Without consultation with them?

A. Without consultation with them?

A. Without consultation with them or any one else of which I have any recollection. If I consulted with any one, it was probably with the head of the miscellaneous division, but I do not think that I did even with him.

Q. State whether Mr. Wilson or Mr. Ingersoll, or whatever attorney it was that attended with Mr. Lemon, came to see you before or after you received the letter from the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations of the House?

A. I am not able to state that. Their coming did not make much impression on my mind. It was nothing unusual. I heard what they had to say, and I do not recollect now what they did say. Whether it was before or after I received that letter from the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, I have not the means of knowing.

Q. Did you know, or have any reason to believe, that Mr. Lemon or his counsel had been to see members of the conference committee before the Follett letter was written, touching the pension appropriation bill?

A. I do not think I had any knowledge at all on the subject. I do not know that I ever knew who the members of the conference committee were, except Mr. Follett. I never saw any of them.

Q. You sent this bill which became a law to Mr. Follett or the 17th of June, 1884?

A. Yes.

And on page 111 as follows:

And on page 111 as follows:

Q. Mr. Fitzgerald was not reinstated until the 20th of that month. Am I right in that?

in that?

A. Mr. Fitzgerald was reinstated on the 16th of June. I have noticed in the record here that the statement was made that he was reinstated on the 20th. That is not correct. He was reinstated on the 16th. Of course he was practically reinstated when the opinion was written (which was before that time), but you will find that the letter reinstating him bears date the 16th of June. Mr. ROGERS. I have not seen that letter.

The SECRETARY, I put it in yesterday. It is an error to say that the reinstatement of Mr. Fitzgerald was on the 20th of June. The order of the Commissioner of Pensions may have been issued on that date, but my action was on the 16th. Q. You mean to say you signed the letter for his reinstatement on that day? A. Yes, sir.

Q. You do not know when the fact of his reinstatement was made known to him?

Q. You do not know when the fact of his reinstatement was made known to him?

A. I do not know. Of course I have no means of knowing. My letter went to the Commissioner of Pensions; but when the Commissioner of Pensions made the fact known I have no means of knowing.

Q. You do not mean to say that Mr. Fitzgerald was notified prior to the 20th?

A. He was not notified at all from our office. (After a whispered remark from Mr. McCammon.) Mr. McCammon tells me that Mr. Fitzgerald knew it the next day after my signing the letter, or the day afterward. After I had signed the letter I had nothing further to do with the matter, and my mind was not charged with it at all.

Q. State whether at any time between the 17th of June and the 24th of June following you were applied to by Mr. Lemon or his attorney for the order made by you on June 26th, and known as order No. 100.

A. I never was applied to by Mr. Lemon or his attorney or anybody in his helaft to make any order whatever at any time. I was in entire ignorance of the fact that Mr. Lemon was negotiating with Mr. Fitzgerald on the subject. I only knew that Mr. Fitzgerald proposed to sell his business from the fact that he came to me and told me that he proposed to sell his business from the fact that he came to me and told me that he proposed to sell his 1 do not think he mentioned to me to whom he was to sell it. He asked me what I was going to do about it, and I told him in substance that I would be liberal with him and help him out. Mr. Lemon has never spoken to me on the subject concerning the sale in any way or manner except what he said to me yesterday in the presence of Mr. Wallace.

And on page 112 the Secretary testified as follows:

By Mr. Rogers:

Q. Are you aware that Mr. Joslyn has testified in this case that the reason why Mr. Fitzgerald was reinstated was that he might make the assignment to Mr. Lemon?

A. I am aware of that fact. As I stated yesterday, I think that Mr. Joslyn confounded the Webb case with the Fitzgerald case; for, in the Fitzgerald case, the only connection he ever had with it that I know of was to write that letter of June 26, or rather to present it to me, because it was Mr. Dawson who wrote it. Q. Are you not mistaken about Mr. Joslyn confounding the Webb case with the Fitzgerald case? You say that Webb assigned his business before his reinstatement.

A. I can not explain Mr. Joslyn's statement.

statement.

A. I can not explain Mr. Joslyn's statement, but I know very well that he did not have anything to do with this Fitzgerald case, and that he must have confounded it with some other case. I think that the only connection he had with the Fitzgerald case was to present to me the letter of the 26th of June, which bears his initials and which I signed.

And on page 118, and on the same day, the Secretary testified as fol-lows (the subject under investigation being the construction of the act of July 4, 1884):

lows (the subject under investigation being the construction of the act of July 4, 1884):

Mr. Rogers. The proviso (as you see) modifies what has gone before. That is the object of a proviso. This proviso is "that in all claims allowed since June 20, 1878, where it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Pensions that the fee of $10 or any part thereof has not been paid he shall cause the same to be deducted from the pension and the pension agent to pay the same to the recognized attorney." There is another feature about it which I want to inquire into. Do you not see that, by the terms of this proviso, the Pension Office has placed upon it the collection of every unpaid fee or part of an unpaid fee where a claim had been allowed since 1878?

The Secretary. I understand that the Pension Office has so construed it. Mr. Rogers. Is not that the proper construction?

The Secretary. I thought yesterday that I should not so construe it. Upon reflection I am not clear whether I would so construe it now or not. But I say there can be no more objection to collecting the unpaid fee of $10 than to collecting the unpaid fee of $25 which the Pension Office is required to do. Under the act of 1878 the Pension Office was required to collect all those old fees that were still outstanding. I do not desire to discuss with you the propriety of the act. It may not be a good act. That is a matter upon which you form your own judgment and I form mine.

Mr. ROGERS. But we wish to have your views upon it, as you are the author of the act, and I suppose that you would like to explain it.

The Secretary. I see no hardship in the law as it exists and as it is construed in the Department; but I should say that it did not strike me that the act went to that extent.

Mr. ROGERS. I will not press you, if you do not wish to interpret the act. I pass now to the last paragraph, section 4786, which reads as follows: "Any agent or natorney, or other person instrumental in prosecuting any claim for pension or retain any greater com

The SECRETARY. Possibly that is so. But that section was put in there for the purpose of putting as far as possible under the control of the Commissioner of Pensions this fee question, which I said the other day had been so great a trouble in the Pension Office.

There is but one fair inference to be drawn from the Secretary's evi-ence. It is clear he did not understand the bill he had recommended. The inference is that he, too, had been overreached. Lemon and his counsel had outwitted him also.

This proviso operated against the Government and the claimants; the pension attorneys alone were the beneficiaries under it. It is fair to assume that it originated with them. Mr. Lemon could, with eminent propriety, emulate the frankness and temerity of the Secretary and acknowledge his paternity of this feature of the Secretary's bill.

Whatever may be the Secretary's recollection as to the impression made upon him by Mr. Lemon's attorneys, he admits he did not comprehend the effect of this provision, and not comprehending it obviously did not originate it.

So outrageous did the Assistant Secretary regard this act of July 4, 1884, as construed by the Secretary and administered by the Commissioner of Pensions that he tried hard, in the Secretary's absence, to explain away its unjust operation and to fix the blame upon the pension officer. The Secretary was then out West, perhaps looking after Senatorial honors. But when he returned he repudiated the Assistant Secretary's explanations and constructions and substantially sustained the Pension Bureau in its administration of this law.

Let any who doubts read their evidence.

Mr. Speaker, not one of these obnoxious features which I have discussed was found in the House amendment which was stricken out in the Senate, and in place of which the Teller amendment was so adroitly substituted in conference. Our committee had carefully avoided these wrongs. There may have been errors in our bill, but if so they were our errors. We understood the bill at least, and thought it was right. If there were errors they favored the claimants. We were trying to do them justice. It was their interests we sought to promote. The bill we formulated twice met the approbation of this House. It met the approval of the Senate as a separate bill at this session.

At this late day, and when so modified as to correct the evils of the act of 1884 and do justice to the nation's pensioners, it has met with enemies on this floor, enemies willing to obstruct legislation, to defeat its consideration.

I hope it is not a source of consolation to those gentlemen, in view of what I have now said, to know that sitting in these galleries, yea, Mr. Speaker, almost over your own head, the chief beneficiary under this Speaker, almost over your own head, the chief benenciary under this legislation, this self-constituted and proclaimed friend of the soldier, has been seen sitting through the long hours of the night, "waiting and watching," no doubt, to see whether this House would, like the Senate, rise up in its indignation and stamp the seal of its condemnation upon his atrocious conduct, and take from him his ill-gotten booty.

Whether this act is repealed or not I have done my duty to the House and to the country. I am gratified that the laborious work we have done will not all be in vain. It may serve to aid the new adminstration to promote the efficiency of the work in the Pension Office.

istration, to promote the efficiency of the work in the Pension Office, and to purify it of unworthy men.

If those whose duty it shall become to administer that office in future will go over the evidence now in print and accessible much will be found that will prove useful in the reorganization and purification of that branch of the public service. That a reorganization and purification are necessary there can be no doubt; that it will be done I have great faith.

Interstate Commerce.

SPEECH

HON. JAMES LAIRD,

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, December 16, 1884,

On the bill (H. R. 5461) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce and to regulate such commerce.

Mr. LAIRD said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It must be a matter of congratulation to the members of this House and to the country at large that this body is about to come to a vote upon the measure under consideration. This is true, not only by reason of the importance of the subject itself, which can not be over-estimated, but so far as most of us are concerned, for another and a peculiar reason. There is scarcely a member of either party who has not heretofore been arraigned for supposititious prospective opposition to this bill or some feature therest. to this bill or some feature thereof.

Political hypocrites, demagogues, and Pharisees in politics—avowing themselves the only true exponents of anti-monopoly—have run an indiscriminate vendetta against all men who did not make the air of October lurid with furious denunciations of the railroads. their estimation no man who "loved the people" could exist othertheir estimation no man who "loved the people" could exist otherwise than in a state of constant rhetorical explosion against monopolies. Their "pot-soon-hot" hatred of "corporations" found expression in words of great "sound and fury," signifying nothing. The people put their brief candle out, and defeat emptied the lofty speech of hypocritical profession from their lips; their hearts no longer palpitate with the desire of self-sacrifice; they no longer rush to "glory," although possibly to the "grave." They have lost their "grip" upon the wheel of fortune and must grovel on until another election gives them opportunity and license to practice their political three-card-monte schemes upon the people.

All honest men, here to do their duty without fear, favor, or hope of reward, who do not look over their shoulders for votes, but who find their recompense in the unassuming greatness of "duty done," will hail this opportunity to record themselves for the one or the other of these bills with great joy, and they will greet the passage of the measure re-ceiving their support, possibly the passage of either, as the triumph of a cause none the less dear to them because they have come to its support through the doubt of well-meaning men, the misconstruction of fools and fanatics, and the "slings and arrows" of a misgnided or an hireling press

It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to confound with frauds and fa-natics that large and respectable class of my fellow-citizens who, in their zeal for railroad legislation, have found fault with all political parzeal for railroad legislation, have found fault with all political parties and have withdrawn from them. The disinterestedness of their action proves the worth of their motives. Their efforts to accomplish the great work of the regulation of the railroads by means of a third party was a mistake, in my judgment, but that they were sincere in it I have no doubt; and sincerity, whether right or wrong, must always command the respect of candid men. Whatever may have been their opinion of the worth of the old parties and their representatives here essembled in this contest they must have to the accomplished work. assembled in this contest they must bow to the accomplished work assembled in this contest they must bow to the accomplished work and rejoice with us in the triumph of principles equally dear to all good men; and here, if we have contended for the right, and not alone for the advantage, does our quarrel end.

Mr. Speaker, there is a disposition on the part of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Reagan] to arraign the Republican party, as a party, for its attitude on the general question of railroad legislation. In his remarks on this subject, made to-day, that gentleman is reported as having read the following from the Republican national platform of June 5, 1884:

The regulation of commerce with foreign nations and between the States is one of the most important prerogatives of the General Government, and the Republican party distinctly announces its purpose to support such legislation as will fully and efficiently carry out the constitutional power of Congress over interstate commerce.

The principle of the public regulation of railway corporations is a wise and salutary one for the protection of all classes of the people, and we favor legislation that will prevent unjust discrimination and excessive charges for transportation and that shall prove to the people and to the railroads alike the fair and equal protection of the law.

This done the gentleman from Texas proceeded to say:

This done the gentleman from Texas proceeded to say:

I commend that to my Republican friends, who are so earnestly combating legislation of this kind. If some of the Republican members who have been discussing this question do show that they believe the people of the country have no rights which the railroads are bound to respect, they surely ought to manifest, outwardly at least, some respect for the political declarations which their national convention thought it necessary to make, in order to enable them to carry the recent election for President and Congress; or do they prefer that the public shall understand that this declaration was simply made to deceive the people and cheat them out of their votes by a false pretense? I must not be understood as applying these remarks to those Republicans who are trying, in good faith, as many of them are, to redeem the pledge of their party to the people on this subject.

This puts in issue the question of what the Republican party, as a party, has done or attempted to do on this question and renders pertinent a brief review of the history of the legislation now under consideration, and the attitude of the Republican party toward it.

Mr. Speaker, the Journals of this House show that on the 3d of December, 1873, Mr. Kendall (Democrat), of Nevada, introduced a bill (H. R. 206) "to require uniform rates for transporting freight and passive december, 1874, and passive december that the second results of the second results are the second results of the second results and passive december. sengers by railroad companies and other common carriers, and to prevent and punish unjust discriminations in favor of or against persons and places." This bill was referred to the Railroad and Canal Com-and places." This bill was referred to the Railroad and Canal Committee, and not reported.

The record also shows that on the 4th of December, 1873, Mr. Hawley, of Illinois (Republican), introduced a bill (H. R. 143) "to regulate commerce among the several States;" which was referred to the Railroad and Canal Committee, and not reported.

And it also shows that on the same day Mr. McNulta introduced a bill (H. R. 150) on the same subject, which took the same reference and was not reported.

bill (H. R. 150) on the same subject, which took the same reference and was not reported.

The record also shows that on the 5th of January, 1874, Mr. Killinger, of Pennsylvania (Republican), introduced a bill "to establish a uniform system of railroad transportation in all parts of the United States and Territories" (H. R. 871), which was referred to the Railroad and Canal Committee, and was likewise not reported.

We are further informed from the record that on the following day of the same year, Mr. McCrary, of Iowa (Republican), reported favorably from the Railroad and Canal Committee a bill (H. R. 1012) "to regulate commerce by railroads among the several States."

This bill, after being discussed in this House, passed this body on the 26th of March, 1874, by a vote of 121 to 116. Pending its passage the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Holman—Democrat) offered a substitute, which provided for a "board of railroad commissioners," to be named by the President, who were to examine and investigate the subject and to prove a schedule of rates the party aggriaved being remitted to the to prepare a schedule of rates, the party aggrieved being remitted to the courts to recover damages for any violation of its provisions, or for the violation of any provisions which the commissioners should prescribe. An analysis of the vote by which the previous or main question was ordered on the passage of the McCrary interstate-commerce bill shows that the 121 votes cast for it were Republican except 5 which were cast by Democrats, namely, Holman, Kendall, Luttrell, Robbins, and Wolfe; the 115 votes cast against it were Democratic, save 36.

The following shows the leading Republicans who advocated and voted for the motion, and leading Democrats who opposed and voted against the same:

Ayes-Republicans. J. G. Cannon. O. D. Conger. Henry L. Dawes. Charles Foster. W. P. Frye. B. F. Butler. James A. Garfield. Eugene Hale. George F. Hoar. G. G. Hoskins. John A. Kasson. George W. McCrary. G. S. Orth. Luke P. Poland. Philetus Sawyer.

Nocs-Democrats. William H. Barnum. James B. Beck. R. P. Bland. L. Q. C. Lamar. Samuel J. Randall. Fernando Wood. S. S. Cox. Heister Clymer. John Cessna. Eppa Hunton William E. Niblack. Clarkson N. Potter. Milton Sayler.
P. B. M. Young.

Not only, Mr. Speaker, did the Democratic party in this House, with the exceptions named, do all it could to defeat the McCrary bill, but prior to that, during the third session of the Forty-second Congress, that party voted almost solidly to defeat and did defeat the motion of Mr. Hawley (Republican), of Illinois, to suspend the rules and pass a bill for the appointment of a board of commissioners to collect information concerning railroads and interstate commerce. The motion was lost-ayes 75, all Republican; noes 98, seventy-nine of whom were Demolost—ayes 75, all Republican; noes 98, seventy-nine of whom were Democrats. (See House proceedings of January 27, 1873.) And thus was defeated in this House by the votes of the party of the gentleman from Texas the first measure looking to some basis for the relief of the people from abuses of the transportation companies—a measure born of the Republican party which he here arraigns; a measure receiving its almost unanimous support, and the unanimous opposition of the Democratic party. Thus far, at least, the "we-are-holier-than-thou" assumptions of the gentleman for his party receive little support from the hard facts of the record. record.

Mr. Speaker, the first bill that I have been able to discover, in a hasty research, introduced on this subject by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Reagan] is H. R. 674, in 1877. In the following year (1878) Mr. Watson (Republican), of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill on this subject (H. R. 2546), which was reported back to the House February 26, 1878, by the gentleman from Texas, by substitute (H. R. 3547). This was recommitted to the Railroad and Canal Committee and afterward favorably reported therefrom to the House May 2, 1878. This bill was discussed in the House; but it finally died on the hands of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] May 17, 1878; but not until he had offered a substitute for it and had conceded in debate that—

As between trade centers this [that] bill may operate a change, and it is the object, and one of the great objects, of this [his] bill to produce a change.

The change sought to be accomplished by the gentleman was to prevent railroads from carrying through or long-haul freights (corn, prevent railroads from carrying through or long-haul freights (corn, wheat, hogs, and cattle) at low rates and local or parcel and package (short-haul) freights at high rates. That bill was regarded as obviously hostile to the agricultural interests of the great West, and to have enacted it into a law might have been to reverse the beneficent rule of "the greatest good of the greatest number," and substituted therefor the greatest good of the least number, because west of the Mississippi, where one out of a thousand only of the producers may be interested in cheap rates for small package or parcel freights, nine hundred and ninety-nine of that thousand are interested in cheap long-haul rates on articles in bulk, such as corn, wheat, hogs, and cattle.

haul rates on articles in bulk, such as corn, wheat, hogs, and cattle.

In 1883 the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Reagan] introduced another bill on the subject, which was substantially the Watson (Republican) bill of 1878. In 1884 the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Reagan] reported from the Committee on Commerce the bill under discussion (H. R. 5461), which was a substitute for sundry bills on the same subject, and to this bill, so reported by him from the committee, he offers a substitute known as "proposed substitute" for H. R. 5461. This substantially covers the entire period of attempted railroad legislation in this House, from its inception in January, 1873, to the offering of the last substitute by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] in this final session of the Forty-eighth Congress. During that time the party of the gentleman from Texas has been in power eight years out of the of the gentleman from Texas has been in power eight years out of the twelve; the gentleman himself has been in Congress ten years of that period. I do not seek, Mr. Speaker, to detract from the motives nor the good work of the distinguished gentleman from Texas. I have a most profound regard for his ability, courage, and unselfishness as manifested in ten years of service dedicated to the cause of the people against monopolies.

In this he has rendered a service to all parties alike, to the country and its institutions. I only protest when the gentleman stoops from his loftly place in this controversy to assail the party which more than any and all others has been the ally of this cause, and often its leader. Among honest men the right and duty to regulate the transportation companies has never been an issue except as to means. There has been no two sides to it, any more than there are two sides to the golden rule. Wise men and honest men have differed as to the manner of procedure, and they differ to-day and always will; but conceding the need of regulation as I concede it, as without exception I believe every member of this House concedes it, there has never been any political differences on the subject, no more than there can be party differences on the question of the right of self-preservation. The people have never divided upon the question of the utility of the first law of nature, and they never will

Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose at this stage of the discussion to do more than call attention to certain great features of the commit-tee's bill and contrast them briefly with the absence of like features in the substitute offered therefor.

The Reagan bill reported by the Committee on Commerce is as fol-

SEC. 8. That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three commissioners, of whom one shall be of experience in the law and one of experience in railroad business, who shall be collectively known as the commission of interstate commerce of the United States, and shall be charged with the duty of carrying into effect the provisions of this act in respect of interstate commerce. One of said commissioners shall hold his office for the term of two years, one for the term of four years, and the other for the term of six years, to be respectively designated by the President, and thereafter said commissioners shall be appointed for the term of six years; and a commissioner appointed to any vacancy shall hold office for the unexpired term. Any one of said commissioners may be removed by the President for cause, but not otherwise. Said commissioners shall devote their whole time and abilities to the duties of their office, and shall not accept or engage in any office or employmentineonsistent with the provisions of this act. If either commissioner, after his appointment, shall be, or shall become by inheritance or operation of law, pecuniarily interested in any railroad or railroad scurity, he shall, within thirty days, divest himself of such interest; and upon his failure to do so, or upon his voluntarily becoming interested in any such railroad or railroad security, his office shall become vacant. No commissioner shall participate in any hearing or proceeding in which he has any pecuniary interest whatever. Each commissioner shall receive an annual salary of $7,500, payable like the salaries of the judges of the courts of the United States: Provided, That before entering upon the discharge of their duties they shall, in addition to the oath required of them by law, take and subscribe to an oath that they are neither directly nor indirectly interested in the ownership or earnings of any railroad company whatsoever.

That the commission may make, and from time to time amend, such general orders as may be requisite for the order and regulation of proceedings before it, including all forms for proceeding, notices and the service thereof, and for the prescribing, directing, or regulating any matters authorized by this act. All the proceedings before said commission shall be upon reasonable notice to all parties interested, and such forms shall conform as near as may be to those in use in the courts of the United States. Any party may appear and be heard, in person or by attorney.

SEC. 13. That for the purposes of this act the commission shall, subject as in this act mentioned, have full power to ascertain and report upon all questions of fact arising under this act, and shall also have the powers following:

Every vote and official act of either of the commission shall be entered of record. The commission may conduct is proceedings in such a manner as will most conduce to the dispatch of business and to justice; they may sit together or separately, and either in private or public, but any proceeding before them shall be public upon the request of either party thereto; and a majority of said commission may determine any question submitted. This bill provides for a commission whose duty it shall be to enforce its provisions.

The substitute offered for this bill by Mr. REAGAN does not provide for a commission. The substitute bill is as follows:

PROPOSED SUBSTITUTE.

To regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers.

To regulate interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers.

Be ttenacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged alone or associated with others in the transportation of property by railroad from one State or Territory to or through one or more other States or Territories of the United States, or to or from any foreign country, directly or indirectly to charge to or receive from any person or persons any greater or less rate or amount of freight, compensation, or reward than is charged to or received from any other person or persons for like and contemporaneous service in the carrying, receiving, delivering, storing, or handling of the same. All charges for such services shall be reasonable. And all persons engaged as aforesaid shall furnish, without discrimination, the same facilities for the carriage, receiving, delivery, storage, and handling of all property of like character carried by him or them, and shall perform with equal expedition the same kind of services connected with the contemporaneous transportation thereofas aforesaid. No break, stopage, or interruption, nor any contract, agreement, or understanding shall be made to prevent the carriage of any property from being and being treated as one continuous carriage, in the meaning of this act, from the place of shipment to the place of destination, unless such stoppage, interruption, contract, arrangement, or understanding was made in good faith for some practical and necessary purpose, without any intent to avoid or interrupt such continuous carriage or to evade any of the provisions of this act.

Sec. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the transportation of property as aforesaid by him or them.

Sec. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in the carriage, receiving, storage, or handling of property as mentioned in the first section of this act to e or receive any greater compensation for a similar amount and kind of property, for carrying, receiving, storing, forwarding, or handling the same, for a shorter than for a longer distance on any one railroad; and the road of a corporation shall include all the road in use by such corporation, whether owned or operated by it under a contract, agreement, or lease by such corporation.

SEC. 5. That all persons engaged in carrying property as provided in the first section of this act shall adopt and keep posted up schedules which shall plainly state:

First. The different kinds and classes of property to be carried.

Second. The different places between which such property shall be carried.

Third. The rates of freight and prices of carriage between such places, and for all services connected with the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, storing, or handling the same. And the accounts for such service shall show what part of the charges are for transportation, and what part are for loading, unloading, and other terminal facilities.

Such schedules may be changed from time to time as hereinafter provided. Copies of such schedules shall be printed in plain, large type, at least the size of ordinary pica, and shall be kept plainly posted for public inspection in at least two places in every depot where freights are received or delivered; and no such schedule shall be changed in any particular except by the substitution of another schedule containing the specifications above required, which substitute schedule shall plainly state the time when it shall go into effect, and copies of which, printed as aforesaid, shall be posted as above provided at least five days before the same shall go into effect; and the same shall remain in force until another schedule shall as aforesaid be substituted. And it shall be unlawful for any person or persons engaged in carrying property on railroads as aforesaid, after thirty days after the passage of this act, to charge or receive more or less compensation for the carriage, receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, or storing of any of the property contemplated by the first section of this act than shall be specified in such schedule as may at the time be in force.

Sec. 6. That each and all of the provisions of this act shall apply to all property, and the receiving, delivery, loading, unloading, handling, or carriage of the same, on one actually or

SEC, 7. That each and every act, matter, or thing in this act declared to be unlawful is hereby prohibited; and in case any person or persons as defined in this act, engaged as aforesaid, shall do, suffer, or permit to be done any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or forbidden, or shall only of the provisions of this act, such person or persons shall forfeit and pay to the person or persons who may sustain damage thereby a sum equal to three times the amount of the damages so sustained, to be recovered by the person or persons so damaged by suit in any State or United States court or competent jurisdiction where the person or persons causing such damage can be found or may have an agent, office, or place of business; and if the court before which any such action is tried shall be of opinion that the violation of the law was willful, it shall make an allowance, by way of additional costs, to the party injured sufficient to cover all his counsel and attorney fees. Any action to be brought as aforesaid may be considered, and if so brought shall be regarded; as a subject of equity jurisdiction and discovery, and affirmative relief may be sought and obtained therein. In any such action so brought as a case of equitable cognizance as aforesaid, any director, officer, receiver, or trustee, or person aforesaid, or any agent of any such acropancy receiver, or trustee, or person aforesaid, or any agent of any such acropancy receiver, or trustee, or person aforesaid, or any agent of any such acropancy receiver, or trustee, or person aforesaid, or any such acropancy receiver, or trustee, or person aforesaid, or any such acropancy receiver, or trustee, or person aforesaid, or any such acropancy receiver, or trustee, or person aforesaid, or any such ac

SEC. 10. That the words "person or persons" as used in this act, except where otherwise provided, shall be construed and held to mean person or persons, officer or officers, corporation or corporations, company or companies, receiver or receivers, trustee or trustees, lessee or lessees, agent or agents, or other person or persons acting or engaged in any of the matters and things mentioned in this act.

The Reagan bill, reported by the majority of the committee, provides both rights and remedies. It prescribes rules of action for the railroads and provides a commission to enforce those rules, and it further provides for the prosecution of any violation of the rules prescribed by the law or by the commission in the courts of the country and at the public expense. The Reagan substitute provides for no prosecution of any violation of its rules—neither by a commission, for which it does not provide, nor in the courts of law. The committee's bill gives affirmative relief. If the Reagan substitute gives any new relief whatever it is entirely abstract; and so far as any enforcement thereof is concerned it is passive and negative, not positive and active as it should be.

The substitute bill provides that no interstate railroad shall charge or receive more from one person than from another for like service at a like time; that all charges shall be "reasonable;" that there shall be no rebates, drawbacks, or advantages in rates to any person.

It prohibits "pooling" by dividing the net proceeds; makes it unlawful for a railroad to charge more for a short than for a long haul;

provides for the posting of schedules of rates and against changes thereof without notice; provides that for any violation of these provisions the guilty party shall pay therefor to the party damaged three times the amount of the damages actually sustained, and if the violation shall be found to have been willful, then the guilty party shall pay, as additional costs, a sum sufficient to cover all the attorney and counsel fees of the opposite party.

With the exception of the rule that no railroad shall charge more for a short than for a long haul of freights, and the provision concerning the posting of rates, the two bills are substantially alike, except in the remedies provided for a violation of their provisions. Aside from the rule of the substitute bill as to long and short haul rates, and the provision as to public notice of the rates to be charged by any railroad, neither bill adds anything to the legal rights now enjoyed by the people before the courts under the law as it now stands.

All the sections of substitute bill, except that as to long and short haul rates, are practically resolvable into the one provision of section 1 of both bills, to wit, all charges shall be "reasonable." This is no 1 of both bills, to wit, all charges shall be "reasonable." addition, then, to the law as already declared. See the leading cases-Munn vs. Illinois, 94 U.S. Supreme Court Reports, page 133, and cases cited; also Peck vs. The Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company, 94 U.S. Reports 164, and cases cited.

The substitute bill declares the lawso far so good; but it makes no provision for its enforcement at the public expense or through a commission. The bill reported by a majority of the Committee on Commerce does both. The Reagan "proposed substitute" gives a right to sue—the citizen has that already; it prescribes rules of action for the railroads and consequences for their violation—the rules so prescribed already exist. The substitute says you can sue the railroad, and if found guilty this bill settles the rule of damages; that, too, is already The farmers of Nebraska do not want a law that says you can sue a railroad. They know they have that inestimable privilege already. What they want is a law which shall provide that if the railroads do wrong, the Government, on the complaint of the citizen, shall prosecute that railroad for a redress of that wrong at its own expense.

The right to sue and be sued the producers have too much of already. They sue and are sued too often to appreciate as "good tidings of great ioy" the much too naked "right" of walking into a court of justice armed with the Reagan substitute bill and calling the delinquent railroad to account, "sustained and cheered" with the knowledge that the Congress has assured them that if they will fight the judicial battle through at their own cost and expense to a successful termination great shall be their reward—"glad tidings of great joy" to the farmers of Nebraska; you can sue a railroad at your own expense, and after you have paid out a thousand dollars for counsel fees and expenses, and finally got a judgment for $10 actual damages you can recover three times that, $30, with the consciousness that the railroad company will contest the question of triple damages through the triple courts and defeat it in the end-after the litigation has swallowed up crops, cattle, and the very patented earth from beneath the farmer's feet.

The great day of the deliverance of production from the thrulldom of monopolies has indeed dawned when the farmer is told that he can sue a railroad company. Since when could we not send "precepts to leviathan to come ashore," and since when could not our leviathan exercise his insolent privilege of not coming ashore until compelled? But the matter is easy, if the railroad leviathan does not come ashore and settle matter is easy, if the railroad leviathan does not come ashore and settle when you send him a summons, all you will have to do, dear Mr. Farmer, is to arm yourself with a copy of the Reagan substitute and go out into the legal deep after him and bring him in. But when you go out remember you must "paddle your own canoe." The substitute bill says to the producers of the trans-Mississippi territory, financially stripped naked by years of waiting for relief from unreasonable charges by the corporations, "Now, if you do not get what is right, go to law"— i.e., launch yourself upon the troubled waters of the legal deep with the right of hankrunting yourself conferred by the Reagan substitute hill right of bankrupting yourself conferred by the Reagan substitute bill tied about your neck like a millstone. This substitute bill, unamended as it stands, bids the Davids of agriculture go forth and battle with the Goliahs of corporate power, to the end that the Davids shall not have the advantage in the strife it takes their slings and stones away from the advantage in the strife it takes their slings and stones away from them, and then on top of that hamstrings them lest they get away after the fight is over. Let us take a practical illustration:

A farmer in Nebraska, we will say, has 500 bushels of corn or of wheat for market. He would have 30,000 pounds for shipment or 300 sacks of 100 pounds each. Suppose the railway company charged him 30 cents a hundred pounds to lay it down in Chicago, $90. Now, let us assume that the charge of 30 cents per hundred is excessive—extortionate, if you please, to the extent of say 10 cents per hundred. The "reasonable" total charge would be $60. The farmer would have cause to complain of the excess, to wit, $30. His right of action under the Reagan substitute bill would be to sue the railroad company for damages for the unreasonable charge, and if he recovered, the rule of damages unconstitutional, so far as the supreme court of Nebraska is concerned; see A., T. & N. R. R. Co. vs. Baty, 6 Nebr., 37; see same holding in Michigan, Massachusetts, and Texas; Bay City and Saginaw R. R. Co. vs. Austin, 21 Mich., 401; Lewis vs. Webb, 3 Greenleaf, &c., 326; Holden vs. James, 11 Mass., 396; James vs. Reynolds, 2 Texas, 251) would be three times thirty, or ninety, dollars! Ninety dollars as the reward and as the result! Will Congress have done its duty by the people when it shall make a rehash of the common law and write it in a printed book covered with calfskin? Will Congress have done anything when it does this? These rules in their substance are written on the tablets of immemorial law, and are known to all men. If I hear the voice of the people aright it demands not rules but results.

people aright it demands not rules but results.

What the producers of this country want is not mere abstract rules of law declaring rights already fixed. They want the rights they already have—those by this substitute more plainly set forth—enforced, and enforced at the public expense, either by a commission, or by litiga-tion, or by both, but at the public expense. The Government created tion, or by both, but at the public expense. The Government created these corporations; now let it control them. What justice is there in locking in the millions of their "surplus (?)" money in idleness in the Treasury and bidding the people "have it out" with the railroads? Men who are for these people and of them, know what they want and can sympathize with them, know that they are sick and languishing and too poor to buy the medicine with which to heal themselves. Seeing them in this state, you write a recipe—a prescription—and you say, "Go purchase the medicine and be cured." There is the "rub;" say, Go patchase the medicine and be cured. There is the "rub;" they tell you they can not get the medicine; they are too poor; and, unless you will give them the medicine they say "Take back your prescription; take back your recipe; we can not heal ourselves with bits of paper marked with crooked marks. We can not protect ourselves with empty laws—with loud declarations of 'rights.'" The railroads, intrenched behind their millions, fortified in the places of power, laugh at and defy them, single-handed, to the legal test.

Under the Reagan bill, as reported by the majority of the committee, if a farmer is wronged he takes his complaint to his State district attorney, or, if more convenient, to the United States district attorney, who shall examine it, and if meritorious, says so; then he lays it before the commission provided in that bill and the board prosecutes it to a conclusion. If he can not find an attorney he can go to any board of trade and get their indorsement of his complaint, or he can make out his statement and send it to the commission direct, and they must investigate it, try it, put it through the courts, bring it to a judicial end. This is a contest between equals, a battle for the rights of a man, however humble, poor, and insignificant financially, in which the giant of corporate power finds its match in the giant of organic power, The government of the nation takes sides; not one man, but all men, for one man, speaking through the mighty potency of the Government. Thus by the committee's bill the faith of the nation is pledged to see fair play, and blind justice need not tremble for the poor.

Give me such a law and I can go back and face my constituents and feel that something has been done—that there had been a beginning of the end. Give me the Reagan "proposed substitute" bill, unless it be amended so as to provide for the public prosecution of complaints by the people by a commission or otherwise, and I go back to my people feeling that this House has frittered away its time and the people's demand in useless refinements of rules already in existence, in the creation of a statutory abstraction, empty of power, utterly impotent in the impending legal battle which must be fought out in the courts between the people and the railroads, hand to hand, dollar against dollar. In such a battle what the people want is not an airy abstraction to stand by like a mythical monster and idly view the strife. They want something which they can use, a weapon with which they can draw blood. judicial blood, and compel corporate respect for their rights. The railroads are not afraid of shadows; the abstractions of the common and statutory law granting "rights" to the people have confronted them since their creation, and they have driven on over both people and the laws together, making the same diabolical answer to all complaints, "the people" and the laws "be damned." What corporate power respects is not the law but the power behind the law—the dollars that stand for its enforcement! The one bill gives this power; the proposed substi-

I am for the bill that says to the railroads, "Here is a just rule; obey it, peaceably, if you will, and all will be right; we do not want to punish nor to destroy you nor even cripple you; refuse to obey it and we will make you do it or break you to pieces upon the wheel of litigation." When this problem ceases to be a question between power and wealth (the railroads) and poverty and weakness (the producers), and becomes a contest between power and wealth (the corporations) and power, wealth, and authority (the Government), then the contest will end and justice will be done, and not before.

I am not saying, Mr. Speaker, that the committee bill is perfect. hope to see it amended in some particulars; its powers should be less circuitous, perhaps; but this remains of it after all is said: it does provide for the prosecution of meritorious cases to a judicial conclusion, and this without expense to the complainant. This the proposed substitute does not do, and failing in this it fails to meet the demands of the hour.

Mr. Speaker, permit me a word upon another feature of this discussion. It seems to be assumed here that the Reagan proposed substitute is the only measure that is anti-monopoly; that all other measures are monopoly measures. Many members may propose to vote for the substitute because it is championed by the distinguished anti-monopolist of Texas, feeling perhaps that if they follow him they are safe. But both bills are his; he leads both ways! The distinguished gentleman is no doubt a sincere opponent of corporate abuses, but so is every honest man. This is not a question of leaders; it is a question of measures. Mr. Reagan is not the only anti-monopolist; various public men and organizations, investigators, and economists, not less distinguished for their identity with the anti-monopoly movement, have spoken and written on the subject, and an appeal to the record will show that Mr. Reagan when he refuses to incorporate the commission system into his proposed substitute is decidedly out of accord with the declared wisdom of his anti-monopoly contemporaries. Let him add to his bill those provisions of the committee's bill that provide for the prosecutions of violations of the law, civil as well as criminal, at the public expense, and provide for a commission to enforce such law, and I will as gladly support the "proposed substitute" as the committee bill, with the exception of one section, which it is contended will operate against the interests of the great West, and upon that I withhold my decision for further investigation.

Is this Reagan "proposed substitute" the great anti-monopoly measure? If it is, why is it that the ablest individuals in the country belonging to that organization refuse it the full meed of their support? Perhaps a portion of the public press is mistaken about this substitute.

Perhaps a portion of the public press is mistaken about this substitute. First. It is said that the "National Board of Trade and Transportation," soon to meet in Washington, will not indorse the Reagan "proposed substitute," and yet such distinguished anti-monopolists, leaders in fact in that movement, as A. B. Miller, F. B. Thurber, and others hold membership in that board. These gentlemen are said to object to this Reagan substitute on the grounds that while it commands "reasonable" rates it fails to prescribe what rates shall be deemed "reasonable," and they also object to this substitute because it fails to provide for a commission to enforce the law or the rules and regulations.

for a commission to enforce the law or the rules and regulations.

Mr. Speaker, if there is an intelligent so-called "anti-monopoly" sentiment extant in this country, as I believe there is, it is found in the suggestions emanating from the "National Anti-monopoly League." The founders of that organization are men of great moral worth, and perhaps of intellectual superiority on this question, and when such a man of that organization as L. E. Chittenden speaks on this subject you can be assured that he has given the matter careful consideration. He does not speak as a demagogue. And what does this league, through its organ, Justice, published in the city of New York, say about this Reagan substitute? It says it "does not provide for a board of railroad commissioners to see that its provisions are carried into execution, and to attend to the new and varied problems which are constantly arising in interstate commerce. To have such a commission seems to us equally as important as the law, and we can not understand why Mr. Reagan does not join hands with Republicans who are free from railroad control in a commission, amend his bill so as to provide for a commission, and pass it."

Mr. Speaker, I assume that such men as L. E. Chittenden, F. B. Thurber, Ex-Senator Boyd, and A. B. Miller, of New York, are quite as good anti-monopolists as we find in Texas, Iowa, Kansas, or Nebraska even. At all events if I were to guide my action by pure anti-monopoly sentiment, undefiled and unpolluted by the greed for office or gain in other directions, I think I could safely follow the lead of the gentlemen whom I have mentioned rather than listen to political "coyotes" who burrow and have holes in New York and in Nebraska.

And on the point that a commission is necessary to enforce the "proposed substitute" the New York State Grange says the principles in the Reagan bill are entitled to consideration and support; they should be enacted into law "by the Federal and State governments, and, if need be, enforced by railroad commissioners."

Mr. Speaker, the prominent anti-monopoly idea is "enforcement"—not found in the Reagan substitute. All writers, economists, and thinkers on this question agree that whatever law may be passed orrules prescribed the ever varying attitude which commerce and railways present in a rapidly growing country should be under some supervision which shall possess within itself a deterrent power or preventive force. The value of such a power is illustrated by the practical workings of the British railway commission. I quote from The Railroad Problem, by Joseph Nimmo, jr., the able Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the United States Treasury. Speaking of that commission, he says:

For their third year in office the commissioners reported twenty-four judgments delivered and six working agreements between companies approved; for their fourth year, nineteen judgments delivered and five working agreements approved; for their fifth year, fourteen judgments delivered and five working agreements submitted for approval; for their sixth year, six judgments delivered and seven working agreements approved; and for their seventh year (only) nine judgments delivered and six working agreements between companies submitted for approval.

Take, as another illustration, the comparative quiet which reigns in all the States in which commissions now exist, and it goes a long ways to prove that a national commission would accomplish like results.

If it be said that a commission would not be able to handle all the cases or complaints which would arise, the answer is that as it would have no jurisdiction over any case save that pertaining to interstate commerce it might be that the number of these would not—even at the outset—exceed the cases which a board in any great State like New York has been called upon to adjudicate. Take the cases left to the English commission having jurisdiction of all those arising in England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, and what do we find? I quote again from Mr. Nimmo (supra). He says:

The number of cases in which the powers of the commission have been invoked is surprisingly few, and even of the cases actually coming before the commission a considerable proportion has merely required its informal mediatorial offices in order to lead the parties in dispute to an adjustment of their differences. The specific cases passed upon, and the general rules evolved from the decisions of the commissioners in these cases, appear to have been regarded by the railroads as typical of the rules of policy which should govern them in their dealings with the public and to have met a cheerful acquiescence.

This is the result of nearly forty-four years of experience and investigation. Judge Cooley, of Michigan, in a very able article on the subject of the importance of an umpire between the public and common carriers, says:

Commissions, if not hampered by excessive and perhaps mischievous legislation, can proceed with deliberation and caution; they can consult and act in concert wherever co-operation is essential; they can deal with peculiar difficulties upon a judgment enlightened by the special facts and uncontrolled by iron rules. In railroad questions we are, as yet, only in the morning twilight; no expert fully masters them in all their bearings; the results are often unexpected and confusing, and the highest wisdom of one year proves to be folly in the next.

In his last report upon the internal commerce of the United States, Mr. Nimmo, concluding a dissertation on the subject of controlling the railways, says:

It is not the purpose to consider in this report the particular evils which may or do exist in this country as the result of the powers exercised by railroad companies, nor the measures adopted or proposed to be adopted for the prevention or correction of evils. That is regarded as outside the functions of this office, and as being a subject which would naturally command the attention of a national railroad commission.

Mr. Speaker, I have not sought to bring to bear a tithe of the valuable testimony extant going to show the probable value to the people of a national board of railroad commissioners. One of the most meritorious results, in my judgment, which would flow from the creation of such a board would be the value of the deterrent power it would possess, and the fund of information that would be disseminated among the people, enabling them and the railways to better understand their mutual relations.

Nor yet have I attempted to cover the grounds specifically which this railway problem presents. The subject is so complex and difficult in its many phases, the value of our internal commerce so great and its flow through well-settled channels so well fixed, that I can quite agree with what has been said here that we can best make some progress, but let our action be marked by "that frugality in the exercise of power which experience has proved wise, in order that enterprise may not be unduly trammeled," panics precipitated, business deranged and revolutionized.
